CHAPTER XI.

IN January 1847 I lost my faithful friend and manager of one of the largest of my districts, Bulram Singh, who had been an officer of my police in 1827-29. He was one of the best natives I ever knew, most faithful and intelligent. The district under his charge was the worst in the country; but he had managed it well—had encouraged the people to increase cultivation—and had laid a good foundation of eventual prosperity. With his last breath he committed his wife and children to my care.

On my return to camp I had to wait till daylight at a village about half-way, which I reached in the evening. The good old mother of the patell being sure, as she said, that I was very tired, had prepared a delicious warm bath for me, and a most abundant and well-cooked supper, consisting of various capital dishes of vegetables and light jowaree cakes. The family were strict Hindoos, and did not eat meat. They had also got ready a comfortable bed, with fresh clean sheets and pillows. This spontaneous hospitality touched me very much ; and it was just the same wherever I travelled.

As the Resident had applied to me to report what kind of a revenue survey would be necessary for the country, I selected a village of average size, and began a regular survey of it, field by field, partly by cross-staff and chain, and partly by prismatic compass, for I had no theodolite, and finished all, including the map, myself ; and then forwarded the whole of the papers, field-books, and registries of proprietors to the Resident, with a report.

I was, however, in no hurry to begin a survey. I considered it would be time enough when the present settlement was at an end, as many of the occupants had measured out their own lands, and were becoming more and more correct. This season was the coolest I had ever felt in the Dec-

can. I find on the 25th February the thermometer varied from 68° to 76° in my tents, and at Poona there had been a frost. It did not, however, last long, and was succeeded by extreme heat.

In March the Rajah's youngest sister, a very pretty little girl of six years old, was married to the Rajah of Soondee, near Madras, aged twenty. He was a courteous, well-bred young man, and the little child was a great pet among us all, so pretty, and very fair, even rosy in cold weather, and quick and clever too. She was being educated in Telooquo, and her favourite book was extracts from the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' which, indeed, was liked by all classes at Shorapoor, and there were occasional readings of portions of it by the Brahmins.

As head of the State, and in loco parentis, I had to perform all ceremonies, except going to the temples, and others of a purely religious character. I wanted the parties to wait till the child was thirteen or fourteen, but her affianced could not delay, as he wrote to me to say he could not be installed as Rajah of Soondee while he was single; and as royal families of Beydurs were very scarce, he was forced to take this child. There was no use preaching in such matters, so I remained neutral, and allowed them to do as they thought proper themselves. The Ranee came to me for 20,000 rupees for the expenses of the ceremony ; I could but refer the request to the Resident, who would sanction only 3000 rupees expenditure by the State, and the Ranee was very much disgusted.

In May the Rajah had another terrible fever, and narrowly escaped death. He was brought up to my house for change of air, when a turn for the better came, and he recovered. If I could have kept him with me longer I would have done so, as the clear cool air on my hill would have renewed his strength, and he much preferred being with me, as his mother's horrible profligacy and want of chastity shocked him terribly : but this he could only tell me secretly, and weep bitterly, poor boy, at the shame it cast upon him.

If Government had removed the Ranee Ishwarama from Shorapoor, as it had done the Ranee of Kolapore, and also at Lahore, all trouble would have been avoided ; but it was not to be so.

However, I reported, as it was my duty to do, her now openly shameless conduct ; and in June I received a despatch in relation to her, from which the following are extracts :—

“ 2. It appears to us a preferable mode of disposing of the case would be that of requiring the Ranee to retire entirely from Shorapoor, and to take up her abode in her father's house at Rutna-gherry. . . .

“ 5. I do not apprehend that the mere banishment of Kasima (chief favourite), and other paramours, would be productive of much benefit with a woman of her immoral character. These personages would probably follow each other in succession, notwithstanding any engagements you may receive from her to the contrary, and you would have the same inconveniences, and the same evil influences to surmount which you have at present.”

But neither the Resident nor I had power or authority to remove the Ranees, or suggest to her “change of air.” It was a question which the Governor-General alone could decide.

My report for the revenue year past, 1256 Fuslee, was considered by the Resident to be “eminently satisfactory ;” but it is too long for insertion here, and too full of local questions to be interesting to the general reader. The Resident was gratified at the low rate of assessment, which was on the general average eleven annas, or 1s. 4½d. per beegah,* that for the Nizam's country being upwards of four rupees, or eight shillings ; and he was satisfied that the increase did not proceed from extra rates of taxation. The result of the accounts was as follows :—

* The standard of the beegah varies in various provinces, but it is generally about one-third of an English acre.

	Rupees.
Revenue under all heads, . . . . .	351,556 2 9
General expenditure—loans, advances, village expenses, . . . . .	245,276 11 6
Cash balance, . . . . .	106,279 7 3
Balances of loans and advances re- coverable, . . . . .	15,124 7 0
Total in favour of the State, . . . . .	121,403 14 3

At last I had a lakh in the treasury ! safe after all payments, including tribute to the Nizam. The Gosain bankers' claim, after being checked in England on their own accounts, transmitted by me, dwindled to 121,000 rupees, on the decision of the Court of Directors, after scrutiny by actuaries. I discovered that the bankers had not credited a payment of 52,000 rupees, received by them from assignment on villages, which was proved by their own receipts to the villages ; and if I had not had the control of the whole State accounts after the death of Pid Naik, and of those of the villages also, I should never have discovered it. The original claim was admitted to be 380,000 rupees. Now 52,000 with interest thereon amounted to 72,000, which had been deducted, and the balance due was therefore considerably reduced, but Luchmangeer and his brethren were in no case to receive it. They were all quarrelling among themselves, and the Resident declared that, until he knew to whom the balance was to be paid, he would give no order on the Shorapoor treasury. He thought it very possible that I might discover other fraudulent transactions, and I was not without hope that I should.

On my report of the previous year, I had the pleasure to receive a copy of an extract from the Court of Directors' political despatch to the Governor-General, which was as follows :—

“Para. 29. From Captain Taylor's report of 12th September 1845, it appears that the Faslee year 1254 had produced an increase in cultivation the preceding year of 17,656 rupees, and of net revenue 18,852 rupees, and that the whole revenue had been collected, except some trifling balances in course of collection.

“30. We agree with the Governor-General that Captain Taylor appears to have shown zeal and judgment in the conduct of the duties of the Sumusthan during the present season. His report contains much valuable information respecting the landed tenures and revenue system of Shorapoor, and he seems to have adopted means well suited for gradually improving the revenues of the country, without introducing such changes of system as might hereafter be embarrassing to a native Government."

In reference to my official report on the current year, the Governor-General was pleased to write as follows.

The letter is dated Simla, 23d August 1847, to General Fraser, from the Secretary to Government with the Governor-General.

"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated May 22d last, No. 62, submitting Captain Taylor's report on Shorapoor for 1846, and in reply, to state that the Right Hon. the Governor-General considers the report satisfactory, and very creditable to the zeal and ability of that officer, to whom you are requested to convey the favourable sentiments of his lordship.

"2. If the removal of the Ranee Ishwarama, the mother of the young Rajah, will tend to benefit the State, the Governor-General will not object to the adoption of the measure. It must, however, his lordship observes, be done with all the forms of courtesy, care being taken that the allowance she is to have in her own country be not too much contracted; but she must be given to understand that its continuance must be contingent on her discreet behaviour.

“The Governor-General approves of Captain Taylor’s proposal to register the military class, and other Jahgeerdars of Shorapoor; and also sanctions that officer’s proposition to make a survey of the whole country, with a view to its final settlement.—I have, &c.,

(Sd.) “H. M. ELLIOTT, Secy.”

Need I say that I was more than satisfied with this cordial letter from Lord Hardinge? and I felt certain that the issue of the current year’s work would assure him that improvement was progressing, slowly perhaps, but I hoped surely.

About this time I had a very strange interview with the Ranee. She had been ailing for some days, and reports were rife as to the cause of her illness, which were disgraceful enough. However, she sent for me early one morning, having, as her servant said, passed a sleepless night, and being very much excited and troubled in her mind. As soon as I had taken my breakfast I went to her. I found her lying on her bed in her private room, seemingly very restless and in pain, moaning incessantly, but apparently dozing. I sat down in the outer room, as I did not wish to disturb her, and the little Rajah came to me crying bitterly.

“‘She is going to die,’ she says,” he whispered. “She has abused me shamefully. She says I am not my father’s child, and bade me go away. Where am I to go to? What am I to do? Indeed I am so frightened, and you are the only one I can look to. I have hidden all her shame and my own, and this is too much! I fear for my life!”

I comforted him as well as I was able, and told him I would bring his mother to reason if I could, and that if he really continued frightened, he should come to my house or go to the cottage at Bohnal. As we were speaking, I heard the Ranee call loudly, सयमेव नयत

“Is he come? Is Taylor Sahib here?”

I went in at once. She was still excited, and her breathing seemed oppressed. I really thought she was dying, and she complained of being “all on fire inside.” I had brought a small bottle of sal-volatile with me, and asking for one of her silver drinking-cups, dropped into it what was requisite; and when one of her attendants had added water, she drank it up, and fell back upon her pillows. After a time she roused herself, and desired one of her servants to go for the purohit or family priest.

"I am dying," she said, "and must tell you all. You are the head of the family and the State, and should know everything."

When the priest arrived—a man I knew very well, as he was always in attendance, and one of the professors, as it were, in the Brahmin Sanscrit College—the Rance told him to bring a certain box which contained the secret papers of the house; and when he had brought it she unloosed the key from a necklace she had on, and bade him open it. The man demurred.

"These papers have never been seen by any one but my lord the Rajah, who is gone to heaven, yourself, and me. No one else knows of them," he cried; "why should you show them to Taylor Sahib?"

The Rance sat up straight in her bed, and glared at him. I had never seen such a look on any human face before.

"Do as you are told," she cried, savagely; "what is it to you what I do?"

The Shastree trembled all over, and without speaking, he unlocked the padlock and opened the lid. The first thing I saw was a roll tied with red silk.

"Tell him first about that," said the Ranee, and fell back again.

"It is not fit you should hear it," said the Shastree, who spoke both Mahratta and Hindostanee fluently.

"It is the Rajah's horoscope which I wrote. The moment he was born I noted the time, and the conjunction of planets, and the result was bad."

"Yes, it is bad!" cried the Ranee, seizing my arm, as I was sitting on the ground by her bedside—"it is bad! All that concerns that base-born boy is bad! Why did his father die? Why did I not strangle him with my own hands rather than let a wretch like that live to be the ruin of the State? Yes! he is fated to die in his twenty-fourth year, and I shall not see it! I am dying myself, and you English have made him secure to glory in my death! Ah, yes! he will die before he is twenty-four complete; we, my husband and I, sent that paper to Nassik, to Benares, and everywhere that there are wise Brahmmins; but they all returned the same answer. He must die in the twenty-fourth year after birth. Is it not so, Shastree? Did we not spend a lakh of rupees over this, and it availed nothing?" and she stopped for want of breath, her eyes flashing with excitement. "Is it not so? Tell the truth!"

"You speak truth, lady," said the Shastree, who was sobbing. "It is only the truth, Taylor Sahib; I have tested all the calculations and find them exactly conforming to the truth according to the planets. The Rajah is safe till then; but when that time comes, how, I know not, but he will surely die. He will never complete his twenty-fourth year! never! never!"

"No!" cried the Rance, interrupting him—"he will not live; he is the last of his race. He will lose his country, and all the lands, and all the honour that the Sumasthan has gained for five hundred years. Would that he were dead now, the base-born dog and slave!" and then she uttered language that I dare not write.

I was obliged to rebuke her sternly, and threatened to go away if she spoke so again; but she cried the more.

"Slave! slave! I wish he were dead, and the State safe! It might go to you—to the English. I would give it freely, now—now—but not to that boy! Listen! never go from him until he is dead—then take the whole yourself. Behold, I give it to you, and the Shastree is witness I give it to you and your children—they shall have it.

O Taylor Sahib ! you have been as a father and mother to me, and I have often used you very ill. I am a wicked woman, and deserve punishment ; but listen to me—forgive me ! Never leave that boy, Enketappa Naik, till he is dead, and burned like Pid Naik—will you promise me this ? I am dying—dying !” she paused for breath, and went on.

“ Now I have told you all the secret I had in my heart, do not tell it to any one till he is dead ; do you put your hands upon my neck and swear this.”

“ I promise you I will not,” I said, “ on the faith of an English gentleman,” as I put my hand, with the Shastree’s, on her neck.

“ Enough !” she cried, “ I am content. Do not suppose I am mad or excited, I am quite myself, only for the pain I suffer. I do not think you will care about the other papers ; they are some of the emperor’s grants to our ancestry, and there are some foolish letters from chiefs in the Mahratta country, asking my husband to rise with them against the English ; but he was too wise to do that.”

“ I will seal up the box in your presence and that of the Shastree with the State seal,” I said ; “ and I will add my own seal when I reach home ;” and to this she agreed.

I sent for the seal, and the priest and I sealed up the box. There was no one else present. I had desired the Rajah to go to his lessons when I went to his mother, so he was in his private apartments. The women in attendance had been dismissed by the Ranee, so that no one could have heard what passed. I showed the Ranee the box sealed up.

"That will do," she said; "keep it now yourself; it is safer with you, whatever happens, than with me. Now I am very weary, and would sleep. Do not think ill of me; but I have only told you the truth before God! I have given you much trouble in coming here to-day—now leave me."

I went. The Rajah sent word I was to come to him; he was learning his Persian lesson with the moonshee; as I entered he bade the man depart and leave us alone.

"What did she say to you, appa?" (father), he said, anxiously; "what is in that box?"

"Only papers," I answered; "the papers of your house, those from Beejapoor, and the emperor, and others. Your mother is ill, and thought herself dying. I will take care of them in future, and I have sealed them up."

"And what did she say? I heard her so angry."

"It was not with me this time," I said, "though you know we do fight sometimes. She only told me what to do in case of her death."

"And will she die, appa?"

"Not this time, I replied; "but she is in pain, and how it may end, who can tell? Do not go near her at present, she has gone to sleep, and may feel better to-morrow." I could not tell the poor boy what she had said of him.

"I will send you word by-and-by how my mother is," he said, presently; "and now leave me."

In the afternoon they sent to me to say she was better, though still weak and in pain, and that she and the Rajah were playing chowsr, a kind of draughts, together.

As I had much to discuss and consult on with the Resident, and a meeting would save endless correspondence, I proposed that I should go up to Hyderabad, and he told me to start without delay.

My journey was somewhat deferred by a heavy case which I had to dispose of relative to a large gang of robbers, whom I was lucky enough to catch, and who during the year past had perpetrated several most daring gang-robberies, attended with murder in the Company's districts to the southward. I obtained, as I expected, great commendation for this capture, as the Bombay Government had been very hot on the matter, and very angry with their magistrates in Dharwar about their apparent neglect. It was not their fault in the least, as the robberies were planned by men about 60 miles northward of me, and the men who committed them had travelled at least 140 miles to the scene of their pillage. They were brinjarries, or carriers of grain, and were quietly encamped at a village about 24 miles off, trading most unsuspiciously in grain and salt. Captain Hervey—an able assistant in the department for “Suppression of Thuggee and Gang-robbery”—was lucky enough to get hold of fourteen of the gang at another encampment about 40 miles south-west of me; and having obtained both information and confessions from them, sent me the particulars so as to enable me to follow up the trail. It was not easy at first to discover their whereabouts; when I did, I sent out a strong party, and to my joy they returned with one leader and sixteen men. The other chief was absent with thirteen more men on some expedition. I secured, however, their wives and families, also their cattle (295 bullocks, 438 goats), and other property, amongst which were many stolen articles recognised by the approvers.

Hervey and I broke the power of this gang very materially. I was anxious about the thirteen men that had escaped us, and I issued notices to all on the frontier to be on the alert in the hope of catching them on their return.

I left Shorapoor at last on the 3d October, reaching Hyderabad on the 9th. The Resident and I discussed all our business very amicably, and the Resident agreed with me on several material points. First, that it would be wise to delay the commencement of the survey for a time; next, to delay also the proposed inquiry into the Beydur lands, of which they were very jealous, and it would be like thrusting one's hand into a hornet's nest; and again, that it would be well to make a second reference about the removal of the Rance Ishwarama.

I did not, of course, tell the Resident of the strange scene which had taken place so recently. Since then she had been amicable and quiet; but who could trust her?

I remained a short time at Hyderabad, and greatly enjoyed a little intercourse once more with my own countrymen and women. What a treat it was to hear some music, and to exchange ideas with men of one's own kind after the life of solitude I had led so long! There was a grand fancy ball too, to which I went as a "nobleman" of the Nizam's Court—a quaint simple dress of white muslin, a small green turban, a shawl and dagger, &c. I wore no beard then, and an artist from the city came and fastened a splendid one on to my chin, so as to join with my whiskers. As I spoke Hindostanee fluently, and could assume all the native manners, nobody found me out; Captain Malcolm and I went together, he as a Muhammadan Doctor of Laws—a capital dress; and as we went with Suraj-ool-Moolk's nephew, and entered the room with him, we passed off well. It was very amusing to be spoken to by the native gentlemen as one of themselves, and to parry their questions as to where I had come from, &c.

Captain Malcolm soon after left Hyderabad, and was a very great loss to me individually, and to the people. They assembled in crowds to see him off, and accompanied him for twelve miles out, and presented him with an address. Such a tribute had never before been given to any Resident or Assistant.

My return to Shorapoor was most unpleasantly delayed by an accident which turned out very serious. The horse I was riding fell under me, and I was injured internally, and confined to my bed for several weeks. The Resident was most kind—coming constantly to sit with me, and I was tenderly nursed at Mr Palmer's house. My only anxiety was about Shorapoor; but the Resident comforted me, saying, "If there is any row, Taylor, I shall go down myself and act for you, so don't be anxious about your affairs."

Nor was I, at first; but the lady, finding my absence prolonged, began to be again very mischievous. Her paramour, Kasima, told her that my being reported ill was only a blind, and that the State affairs were now to be made over to her; that I had been removed from Shorapoor, and was under the heavy displeasure of the authorities, and the like. One act of hers annoyed me excessively. I had desired the Rajah occasionally to write to me as an exercise in English. Some time elapsed, and I received no letter. I wrote to inquire the cause, and an answer came, a good specimen of handwriting to show the Resident. The Rance had been absent when the note was written and despatched. On her return she sent for her son, and beat him very severely with her own hands for daring to write to me and to ask when I was coming back. The poor lad was terribly frightened, and sent me word privately to come quickly, for that much evil was going on; and he afterwards managed to write to me in Teloo goo, urging me to make haste, "for his life was not safe." The Ranee was gathering all the heads of the Beydurs clans together about her, under Kasima, feasting them, and giving them silver ornaments and other presents. One day the runner who carried the post-bag was going as usual along the road when four Beydurs jumped out upon him from behind a hedge and demanded the bag. The man would not give it up, and fought well with a stick ; but this was of no avail against the swords of the Beydurs, and the poor fellow's left hand was struck clean off, and he fell senseless under repeated blows. The bags were then seized, and were afterwards found in a lonely place, but they were empty. A large reward was offered, but no clue could be obtained as to the perpetrators of the outrage. I strongly suspected female curiosity was at the bottom of it, and that the Ranee wanted to find out what was said of her by me. She gained nothing, however, as I took care not to write anything about her or her doings by the post. The town was reported to be full of parties of Beydurs, going about with drawn swords ; and at an assembly a resolution was passed that no orders of mine were in future to be obeyed. This resolve emanated solely from the Ranee's party; the remainder, who were likewise the majority, were yet, or appeared to be, stanch.

I had recovered pretty well from my severe illness, and was growing very anxious to return to Shorapoor. My detention had happened at a very awkward time; but still, under God's blessing, I believe my life was saved, as had I been at Shorapoor, with no skilful surgeon near, my life must have been in all probability forfeited. So as soon as I could get leave I started, having first had a long consultation with the Resident, who was of very decided opinion that the Ranee must go—and that at once; and that Lord Hardinge's order should be carried out. A letter from the Resident to the Ranee was soon drafted, and troops were desired to be in readiness to march on the shortest notice upon my requisition.

I reached Shorapoor on the 3d February, having been absent three months. The Rajah came out several miles to meet me, and embraced me, imploring me “not to let him go back to his mother any more.” We went up together to my house. The city seemed full of armed men, but I took no notice of them; my main object was to prevent collision between the two parties of the Beydur clans and the Rajah's personal adherents, which, if it occurred, must have led to disastrous consequences.

The next morning I had a translation of the General's letter ready for the Ranee ; and during the night, she, anticipating being taken to task for her proceedings, had assembled all her men in Shorapoor, and sent out orders for all those in the districts to come in ; and these were fast arriving across the hills in detached parties. When my letter reached the palace, there were about five hundred of her adherents outside, who rushed about the streets with drawn swords ; but happily there was no collision. I sent warnings to them in vain, and so did the Rajah ; but his messengers were insulted, and all declared they would obey no orders but the Ranee's. I had posted all the trusty Beydurs inside the palace, and had sent for the garrison of Wondroog, which was stanch to the Rajah, and thus had nearly four hundred men about him. My great object was to prevent collision between the parties ; and the palace guards behaved admirably. When the rebellious party thundered at the gates, demanding the Ranee and Kasima, who were inside, no one stirred, and the Rajah controlled his people with admirable temper. As darkness fell the insurgents retired to a high conical hill, the headquarters of some of the clan, and consulted how to make a night attack on my house ; but I, as well as my position, were too strong for them ; and finding that but few of the country Beydurs joined them during the night, they sent to me for terms. I would take none but unconditional surrender of the leaders and their arms ; and in an hour or two sixteen of the leaders were brought to me, and the insurrection was at an end.

General Fraser, the Resident, had written to me to say that he wished to come down to Shorapoor himself ; and I thought he expected some disturbance on the Ranee's removal. I therefore awaited his arrival, according to the instructions I received from him, before finally sending off the Ranee. During the night painful scenes had passed between her and Kasima, each reviling the other in no measured terms. He had threatened to murder the Ranee, and had drawn his sword on her. The Rajah had interposed ; but Kasima said he would not give up his sword to any one but me. Accordingly the Rajah sent him to me, when he and five of his brothers placed their arms before me on the ground, and all were put into confinement. Several other leaders gave themselves up during the day ; but three of the very worst remained at large, trying to rouse the district Bey-durs. However, nothing came of their efforts. In the afternoon the Rancee sent for me, and I went. She was quiet enough then, but was crying bitterly. She told me she had been behaving very ill, and that she knew I must carry out the orders of Government. She also confessed to having concealed valuable State jewels, &c. ; and when they were brought I sent them to the treasury. Her only hope was that she would be treated with courtesy ; and this, I assured her, would be the case. Her son's delight that this interview passed over so quietly was indescribable : he and his little sister and brother clung to me, and I could hardly get away.

On the 11th the General arrived, and I went out to meet him and bring him in. As he entered the town and ascended the hill, a salute of seventeen guns was fired from the ramparts, and a second from the guns near my house. All the officers were assembled at my house to receive him, and a guard of honour of the 1st Regiment presented arms as he alighted from his palankeen. A few minutes after the young Rajah came up, with a great concourse of people, and was duly presented to the General by me. He was remarkably well dressed, and behaved very properly, answering all the General's questions with the ease and precision of a well-bred gentleman. All the male members of his family accompanied him, and also the most respectable inhabitants of the city, who were introduced by me, one by one ; and after sitting for a while they took their leave, and the General was left to refresh himself after his journey.

The Resident was very complimentary to me on my arrangements, and was especially struck with the success of my plan at the palace for cutting off the Ranee and Kasima inside from their adherents outside. I told him the Ranee was ready, and had agreed to go ; and he thought with me the sooner she was off the better. I therefore went down to the palace, having previously sent on her tents and some of her baggage and attendants. I was busy for four hours, making all final arrangements and settlements, and at last she was ready. Up to this time she had been quiet ; but of course at the last there was a scene. Her women set up a howl which was heard at my house, and she cried a great deal. She refused to see the Rajah, which I was glad of ; and he did not desire to see her. She asked me for a note to the Collector of Bellary, which I gave her. She then rose, requested me to take care of her children ; and I led her to the door of the outer court, where her palankeen was waiting. As she entered it she said, "I know this is all my own fault. Forgive me. You could not help it." And kissing my hand, she closed the doors, the bearers took up their burden, and in ten minutes she was beyond the gates, the escort closing round her.

I then went to the little Rajah, who threw his arms round me, saying, "He had only me now, and he hoped I would take care of him, there were so few he could trust." I told him not to be afraid. I had had a very painful task to perform ; but now it was over, and I hoped we should have no more disturbance or anxiety. I then took my leave, and returned to my house and to the Resident, who had been very anxious, and shook me warmly by the hand, congratulating me that this much-dreaded event had been so quietly got over. Indeed I had again deep cause of thankfulness for the happy issue of what might have been a fearful scene of tumult and strife.

The Resident paid a return visit next day to the Rajah, and was taken to the Ranee's late apartments, where several members of the family were awaiting us. After some conversation the men retired, and I went for old Kesámá, great-aunt to the Rajah, and all the children, who came nicely dressed ; and the General took two on his knees, and was much amused by their chat. He promised the old lady to be kind to the children and the State; and then she took the Rajah, and begged the Resident to put him into my arms, which was done, to her infinite satisfaction. This over, wreaths of flowers were hung about our necks, atr was given us, and we departed. We went round the city on elephants, and I showed the Resident all through it. We passed the Beydur's large "tree of assembly," where about 1500 of them had congregated all armed, and lining the road. I stopped the elephants, and the Resident addressed them, assuring them that their Rajah would be cared for and their State also. It was now dusk, and a host of torches were lighted, and blue-lights stuck on poles preceded us. The effect was wonderful, revealing wild rocks and wilder faces, most picturesque and startling in the fitful glare.

Next day I showed the Resident the lake at Bohnal, explaining to him my project for enlarging it, which he approved. He left next morning, having expressed himself most heartily pleased with all he had seen, and saying he would write to me from Hyderabad officially, and in due time the despatch arrived. I subjoin a few extracts.

"SIR,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your several letters noted in the margin. . . .

"2. Having had an opportunity of fully communicating with you in person at Shorapoor regarding the affairs of that district, I have now the gratifying duty to perform of placing on record my entire and unqualified approval of the whole of your recent proceedings. . . .

"4. Your very judicious measures, taken previously to their arrival (the troops), had already restored tranquillity, and reduced the insurgent Beydurs to obedience, besides obtaining the assent of the Ranee Ishwarama to remove from Shorapoor to Rutnagherry. . . .

"6. You will be pleased to order an immediate investigation to be made into the conduct of the Beydur prisoners transmitted to Linsoogoor under charge of the 1st Regiment (Nizam's Infantry). I think it desirable that this inquiry should be made by a Commission, presided over by yourself, with Captain Commandant Johnston, and any other officers whose services may be conveniently available, as members. . . .

“9. The proceedings of this Commission will be forwarded by me to the Government of India; and pending the decision of that authority as to the ultimate disposition of the prisoners, you will be pleased to request Captain Commandant Johnston to detain them under custody sufficiently strict to prevent any risk of their escape, but without unnecessary severity.

“10. I shall submit the whole of your correspondence, now acknowledged, for the information of the Government of India, and I shall be happy to bring to the special notice of the Right Honourable the Governor in Council the ability, judgment, and firmness by which you succeeded in averting the serious danger which threatened the district of Shorapoor, and perhaps the necessity of having recourse to actual military operations, which might have proved a source of much present inconvenience, besides involving a consequence still more to be deprecated, that of injuriously affecting the relations subsisting between the Bcydurs and yourself, and substituting fear and distrust in lieu of that confidence and attachment which I feel assured the majority of the people now bear towards you.—I have the honour to be, &c., J. S. FRASER, Resident.

To this I, of course, returned a suitable reply ; but I was obliged to go out at once into the districts, as my long detention at Hyderabad had materially interfered with my work and I could delay no longer. The Commission of Inquiry was therefore postponed for a time. As the settlements now only required supervision, my labour was comparatively easy ; but the crops were bad, the cotton and wheat were blighted, and other products injured by excess of unseasonable rain. And I had to make some material remissions which in the end satisfied everybody. Lord Dalhousie had now succeeded to the office of Governor-General and took his seat in January, and the whole of the Shorapoor correspondence would be laid before him. I was anxious for the result, and it arrived at length. It was most satisfactory. His Excellency in Council expressed his entire satisfaction with the manner in which the affair of the Rance had been conducted, and “directed” that his “approbation of the ability, firmness, and judgment” I had displayed should be conveyed to me. It was all very gratifying ; but I could not but miss more than ever the dear face that would have lighted up with loving joy and pride at my success, and I never liked to return to my beautiful house. Old wounds would reopen, and I longed for a kind word or a loving smile to greet me there. I determined then, however, to live out my life alone, and that I would never seek marriage with another; and I have kept faith to her who is gone and to myself, and shall do so till I die. This determination was the result of a very curious and strange incident that befell me during one of my marches to Hyderabad. I have never forgotten it, and it returns to this day to my memory with a strangely vivid effect, that I can neither repel nor explain. I purposely withhold the date and the year. In my very early life I had been deeply and devotedly attached to one in England, and only relinquished the hope of some day winning her when the terrible order came out that no furlough to Europe would be granted. One evening I was at the village of Dewar Kudea, after a long afternoon and evening march from Muktul, and I lay down very weary; but the barking of village dogs, the baying of jackals, and over-fatigue and heat prevented sleep, and I was wide awake and restless. Suddenly, for my tent-door was wide open, I saw the face and figure so familiar to me, but looking older and with a sad and troubled expression. The dress was white, and seemed covered with a profusion of lace, and glistened in the bright moonlight. The arms were stretched out, and a low plaintive cry of "Do not let me go ! do not let me go !" reached me. I sprang forward, but the figure receded, growing fainter and fainter, till I could see it no longer, but the low sad tones still sounded. I had run barefooted across the open space where my tents were pitched, very much to the astonishment of the sentry on guard ; but I returned to my tent without speaking to him.

I wrote to my father. I wished to know whether there was any hope for me. He wrote back to me these words :—

"Too late, my dear son. On the very day of the vision you describe to me, ——— was married." . . .

Shortly after my return to Shorapoor, I succeeded in catching two of the Beydurs who had escaped. One of them tried to stab himself when apprehended ; but, being prevented in time, only scratched his stomach. They both made a confession which cleared up everything in regard to the late insurrection. It was they who, with two others, attacked the post-runner and took his bag from him by order of the Rance and Kasima, in order to find out what I had written. In all, they had hoped to raise 10,000 men, and relied on the treasury for payment, which was to be seized by them. I was to be prevented from entering Shorapoor unless I promised to accede to all the Ranee wished ; but the Rajah coming out to meet me, which they had never contemplated, put an end to that part of the scheme. So far all was clear enough, but subsequent declarations and confessions by other parties proved contradictory, and others were accused by them as well as the Ranee. So I took the witnesses to Linsoogoor to be examined before the Court then sitting, and left it to the Resident to unravel what he could. I never had had experience of anything at all like the lies and counter-lies recorded on that memorable occasion ; they beat all that had come to my knowledge.

I had a letter from my friend the Ranee, who preferred remaining at Bellary, and I was glad she did so, as she was more under surveillance at a large station ; she expressed herself content and satisfied, and I answered her note telling her of her children and their welfare.

The accounts of the State would possess no interest for the reader ; but the table given below will show how I was progressing.

Balance in favour of the State for 1253 '54, '55, '56, and '57 Faslee :—

1844 (1253 Faslee ), balance,	.	Rs. 45,456	7	6
1845 (1254 " " . .	.	41,805	11	9
1846 (1255 " " . .	.	74,898	6	3

while the whole cash account of the treasury, which included receipts from other sources, shows the balance in hand to be Rs. 348,977 : 14 : 9.

How quiet was everything at Shorapoor for the next two years. No intrigue! no suspicion! no combinations! The Rajah, as he grew up, advanced in intelligence, and daily attended to all the current business, working with me cheerfully and well, and I had no apprehensions on his account. The Nizam's Government had withdrawn their demands for balance claimed, and the Court of Directors had repudiated any claim for interest on the bankers' bonds on the discovery of their forged interpolation. It became now a question whether they were not debtors to the State; and so 1849 opened pleasantly. 1848 had been a turbulent year in many parts of India, but though the second Sikh war was not concluded, there was no doubt now as to its issue, and in March 1849 the Punjaub was annexed to the British Empire.

I was summoned to Hyderabad to report on the proceedings of the Court on the Beydurs, and I was obliged to state that not only had I never been summoned as a witness, or as a prosecutor, but that the Court had wandered into extraneous matter, and had been at the mercy of false witnesses both for and against the prisoners. That the chief points of the insurrection had never been inquired into at all—that is, the assembly in arms, &c. My paper was sent in to the Court, and at length I was summoned; after which the final finding of the Court was that the prisoners had been guilty of overt acts of rebellion; but in consequence of their long imprisonment, they were recommended to mercy—and the Ranee, who had never been on her trial at all, was acquitted! The whole proceedings were forwarded to Lord Dalhousie, who eventually confirmed the finding of the Court; and some of the prisoners were released. He blamed me too, for having been misled—why, I could not understand. The measure of removing the Ranee was one of Lord Hardinge's which I had to see carried out, and it was done without bloodshed. Perhaps the Court was bewildered by the great mass of contradictory evidence before it; and possibly even his lordship's astute mind was too, for he made ample amends to me hereafter.

The Ranee was to be allowed to return, but when or how was not specified.

In July we had another visitation of cholera, and the Rajah's half-brother died of it, to the great grief of the family. He was a very interesting and promising child; but no care availed to save him. I sat up myself with him for four successive nights, and he died, poor little fellow, in my arms.

I was greatly interested in the extension of the lake at Bohnal; it was my first essay at irrigation works, and proved a complete success. I had taken careful levels of the whole of the ancient embankment, which was much higher than was necessary. I added 12 feet to the escape-weir, and took advantage of some natural hillocks beyond the weir to extend the embankment in accordance with the old portion. The lake filled in September, and was a truly noble sheet of water,  $2\frac{1}{2}$  square miles (rather more than 1600 acres) in area, with an average depth of 12 feet. I had built a small schooner for the Rajah, and we sailed matches against each other, to his infinite delight; he never cared how hard it blew.

The despatch of the Court of Directors upon my reports for 1847 and 1848 was very cheering and acceptable to me. Its length alone prevents my giving it here; but it was evident that all I had already done and proposed to do had been well and carefully considered and approved.

The Rajah had removed from the palace in which he had lived with his mother to the older and original residence of the family. It was badly built, and during the heavy rains of the present year, one night a corner of the building fell, and so shook the whole that repair was impossible. I therefore asked and obtained permission to build a new palace; and I set to work to make designs for it. The building was handsome and commodious when finished, but I could have wished a larger space for it to stand in.

Several other tanks were in progress, and I determined to try, in these ways, to lay out the surplus in the treasury to the best future advantage of the State. Bohnal works cost 6000 rupees, and this was entirely paid back during the very first year by the increased return of rice and sugar-cane produce.

On the 20th May 1850 my friend the Ranee returned! having been away from us for more than two years. She had got terribly into debt, and had nearly been sent away from Bangalore to Vellore in consequence of her intrigues. She had been ill too; but in spite of all, here she was again!

She stayed some days at Linsoogoor, where a house had been taken for her, and I had a very amusing account of her most absurd demands and unreasonable requests.

She wanted three good houses belonging to private individuals, who were to be deprived of them ; and if she did not get them, she vowed she would come up to my house and live there ! This was indeed an alarming prospect for me ! However, I, with the Rajah and all the principal people, went to meet her at the Krishna, the frontier, where the Rajah's new suite of tents had been pitched for the first time for her especial accommodation ; and as she crossed the river, we went forward to welcome her, and conduct her to her tent. She refused to enter the large one ; but chose a dirty little one belonging to her servants ; and a very stormy and disgraceful scene occurred, which, as my last illustration of the lady's temper and disposition, I copy from a letter written to my father.

“ We were all there, and after a short interval, glaring at us one by one, she burst out—

“ ‘ Well ! and what have you sent for me for ? ’

“ ‘ We did not send for you,’ said I, and several others.

“ ‘ Yes, you did. Do you think I would have come of my own accord? You had better kill me, and throw me into the river, or put me in the guard-house. How very proper and pleasant it will be to be in the guard-house! Why shouldn't I live in the guard? Have you got those houses I ordered?'

" 'No, Ranee Sahib!' I answered. 'The houses you ordered are private property, and you cannot have them.' "

" 'Can't have them?' she cried; 'who are they to deny me? Am I not Ranee of Shorapoor? Can I not do as I choose?' "

" 'No, not quite,' I returned; 'not with what belongs to other people.' "

" 'No? I can't? we shall see,' she cried. 'Did not General Cubbon and Mr Pelly, and —— and —— and ——' (hurling at me a host of names), 'and a lot of other people, tell me I could do whatever I liked? and yet it seems I am not to have my very first wish gratified. Am I less than those people? Are they not my slaves? Well' (after a torrent of abuse), 'and where am I to go?' "

" 'To the palace, Ranee Sahib,' I replied. "

" 'The palace! I won't go there! no, not to my old place! I won't be taken there except by force. Why don't you tie me hand and foot? You are powerful, and I am only an old woman.' "

(Here the Ranee began to whimper.) ‘Put me into the river at once. I’ll not go to Hyderabad, or to Bangalore, or to Bellary. I’ll go on pilgrimages. I will not stay here. I won’t! I won’t! No, I won’t!’

“‘But,’ I said, ‘Ranee Sahib, you seem to forget that your son, the Rajah, is sitting near you; you should go with him and me, and we will both try and make you as happy and comfortable as we can.’

“‘My son!’ she screamed. ‘My son! He is no son of mine, the base-born! He my son!’ and a volley of invectives followed. ‘I wish he were dead! Why did he live, and not my sister’s child? Yes! you killed him among you, just to vex me!’ (and more abuse succeeded, which I could not translate.) ‘He my son indeed!’

“Poor little Rajah; how he bore it I know not: but every now and then he pulled at my coat, or squeezed my hand, and whispered—

“‘How can you bear it? Come away.’

“I told him we would bear it as long as we could, for I was in hopes the storm would spend itself, and that she would be more amenable afterwards; but there was yet a very ticklish subject to introduce—viz., her former estates, or jagheers;

she being now only dowager, and the young Ranee having the estates ; an allowance having been substituted for her lands.

“ How she raged and foamed when I told her ! What a fierce war of rage and passion waged when I explained matters to her ! Her allowance had been fixed at 1000 rupees a-month. She became quite beside herself when she heard this, and made use of language that made one’s blood creep. The idea of pay was worse than anything.

“ ‘ Am I a servant ? ’ she yelled, ‘ that I should take pay ? Have not other Ranees their estates ? Why do you take mine ? ’ Then a fit of crying, then more abuse ; till at length my patience and temper could stand it no longer, and I fairly told her that if she did not come to Shorapoor, as she was directed and permitted to do, I should dismiss her escort, and leave her where she was. That the decision of Government could not change ; sooner would the current of the river turn and flow upward. I strongly advised her to return to Bangalore until she was in a more reasonable frame of mind ; and I ended by telling her, that if she continued so violent I should report everything that she said to Government, and that she would probably get deeper into trouble. At length, at sunset, after having endured her society for nearly four hours, we left her.

“ At eleven at night she sent for me again. What a life this woman led me ! I took a relative of hers with me, a respectable man. She was restless and uneasy, said she was sorry for what she had uttered, that she had lost her temper, that she could not sleep because I had left her in anger, and had sent for me to tell me so, &c. ; and that she had determined to go to Shorapoor next day, and would do exactly as I bid her. Also she proclaimed that she intended to live privately, and to have no men about her ; that they had all cheated her, and brought her into trouble. As I found her cool, and reasonable, I gave her a lecture, appealing to what feelings she had, and showing her how her own evil doings had led her into disgrace and banishment, and would inevitably do so again if not controlled. She seemed to feel my words, and kept repeating, ‘ I have no true friend except you. Forgive me ! forgive me ! ’

“ After a long talk I left her and came home to bed, tired and worried enough. Next day we all started, the Rajah riding a fine horse ; and about 3 P.M. the Ranee came to his tent, and seemed more pleased to see him. In the evening we started for Shorapoor, about seven miles, she and I in palankeens, the rest all on foot or on horseback—a motley crowd, but very numerous. The Ranee appeared in very good humour, and thanked me for having received her with so much honour. When she arrived at the palace, all the children, with dear old Kesámá, met her; but she took no notice of any one except Kesámá, at whose feet she fell, praying her to forgive her, and to place her hands upon her head—which the good old lady did at once.”

Thus the Ranee subsided into her old palace and old associations. She had brought a poor half-caste with her, and amused herself by writing English letters to officials she had known during her absence; but as these were invariably returned to her, she addressed the Resident with the like result. Her allowance was higher than she expected—12,000 rupees a-year—and she professed herself content.

She sent for her old friend Kasima, who came to me in much alarm.

“What am I to do?” he said. “I have had quite enough of her and of her schemes—she is a devil.”

“She was kind to you,” I replied; “she had you married in state, and made her son, your prince, walk before your palankeen ; you should not abuse her. All you have to do is to keep quiet ;” and he took my advice.

When I came in from the country in August the lady was very quiet, and returned my visit, bringing some of the children with her, and staying nearly all day amusing herself in my garden ; but I found her chief object was to present me with a schedule of her debts ! These amounted to 62,000 rupees, and there were more behind. I had no authority to pay any such sum, which had been borrowed by her chiefly in Mysore ; and whether permission would be granted for the payment of these debts or not I could not tell. Eventually 500 rupees a-month was deducted from the Ranee’s allowance to give to her creditors, a decision which set her frantie ; and she announced her intention of appealing to Parliament, though utterly ignorant of what that tribunal was, or where !

CHAPTER XII.

A copy of a despatch from the Court of Directors reached me in December. It was most satisfactory, and reviewed the transactions of 1847-48. It was full of honourable commendation, which I need not here repeat; but the State had made great advance since then in material prosperity, and I was glad to have an opportunity of showing it to Major Johnston, then military secretary at Hyderabad, and he promised to write to Sir Henry Elliott, at that time secretary with the Governor-General, and to tell him all he had seen, and about the improvements in progress. I found the Ranee very ill and miserable—she had had a stroke of paralysis that had affected all her left side, and more particularly her face, which was now hideous; and there was little doubt that dropsy had set in, in addition. The apothecary who had charge of the public dispensary and hospital did what he could for her, but had a very bad opinion of her case.

In March my public report for the year past went in, and was reviewed by the Resident, General Fraser. He was perfectly satisfied; and on the report of Major Buckle, engineer-in-chief at Hyderabad, sanctioned my estimate for the new tank at Kuchaknoor, near Bohnal. Major Buckle had great experience in irrigation works in the Madras Presidency, and was kind enough, during one of my visits to Hyderabad, to instruct me in the principles of the construction of dams, sluices, and the like. I had put these instructions into practice, and sent up all the estimates, with survey, plans, and sections, for this new work. I was very anxious to complete it, if possible, during my stay at Shorapoor. It would be of considerable magnitude—the dam 1872 yards in length; the greatest depth of water-storage 50 ft; the average of the whole basin about 20 ft.; and the area of water  $6\frac{1}{2}$  square miles. It would be a noble sheet of water, and very profitable, as it would irrigate upwards of 10,000 beegahs of rice. As soon as my estimates were sanctioned I began the work, and the Rajah opened it with all due ceremony, turning the first sod, and carrying the first basket of earth.

The concluding paragraph of General Fraser's despatch was as follows :—

“I consider it, however, due to you to place upon record the renewed expression of my entire approval of your public conduct, and my highest commendation of the unremitting and devoted attention which you give to the discharge of your important duties.”

Could I desire more? Still my life was lonely and dreary : I had no society whatever ; and only at rare intervals a short visit from some friend or passing traveller. If it had not been for my daily work, which lasted from seven in the morning till eight at night, and sometimes longer, I could not, I think, have endured the entire isolation of my life, all official praises notwithstanding.

During my wanderings over the Shorapoor district in this and former years I had discovered, in many places, cairns and dolmens, some of them of very large size, corresponding in all respects to similar monuments in England, Brittany, and other places. I mistrusted my judgment in regard to them for a long time : but at length I drew up a paper on the subject, accompanied by sketches ; and followed it up by another in regard to the contents of cairns which I had opened. In one spot, near Sholapoor, I found most curious remains—a large barrow, with a parallelogram of rocks, 440 ft. by 280 ft. The rocks were in regular line, some of them 12 ft. long and 9 ft. thick, and from 5 to 6 ft. high. They had been rolled from the granitic range, a distance of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  mile. Another place contained an immense number of large rocks, placed in regular rows, direct and diagonally, leaving squares of from 5 to 6 yards between. In this area were some cairns. I sent my article on the subject to the Royal Asiatic Society in Bombay, who did me the honour to elect me a member. These stone monuments of Shorapoor tallied exactly with European examples ; but it seemed to me so strange a discovery that I almost doubted whether European archæologists would admit it. They did so most fully afterwards, and my discoveries at Shorapoor were followed by others even more interesting in other portions of lower India.

For a long period the affairs of the Nizam's Government had been in a critical state. It owed nearly one million sterling to the British Government, which it could not pay. The Contingent was constantly in heavy arrear, and Lord Dalhousie, urged by the Court of Directors, pressed for a settlement. The subject had been under reference to England for several years; but it appeared now nearer a conclusion.

The Nizam had tried several Ministers in succession, who had failed. He then attempted to govern himself, and failed more signally than his Ministers. The State had no public credit, and the administration in the provinces was oppressive to the people, and utterly corrupt. Now affairs seemed to have reached a climax. Provinces, detailed in a minute I wrote by desire of the Resident in January 1851, were to be made over to the British Government, and I was to be put in charge of one of them.

"The experience and past services of Captain Meadows Taylor," wrote Lord Dalhousie to General Fraser, "at once point him out as the proper person for undertaking the direction of those districts which lie near Shorapoor, if his present occupation will admit of his entering on this additional charge."

It would have admitted of it, for no new measures were required at Shorapoor, and the Rajah was gaining enough experience to manage fairly for himself, with a little assistance now and then. He transacted most of the current business, and did it very well. His new palace was finished outside, and nearly inside also, and the upper apartments were very airy, cool, and spacious.

My only dread was on account of his mother, who, I feared, was endeavouring to drag him into her toils by the worst possible means. However, the new arrangement with the Nizam was not to come into force at once. I was summoned to Hyderabad, to be given charge of a province, but returned as I went—the appointment being delayed. When there, I ascertained many more particulars of the condition of the Nizam's Government than I previously had knowledge of, and in some respects it was worse than I thought.

The first instalment of the Nizam's debt, 40 lakhs, £400,000, had been remitted to Calcutta, and the second was due ; but there were no funds to meet it. The Nizam sent to his Minister, Suraj - ool - Moolk, jewels, which his Highness valued at 30 lakhs, to be pledged for that amount ; but the bankers only valued them at 10 lakhs, and they even declined to give four for them. The principal bankers were so shaken, in fact, by their previous loans, that not only were they unable to make money, but some were even threatened with insolvency. At the instance of capitalists at Madras an advance had been made on the Nizam's jewels of five lakhs ; but this was a mere drop in the ocean.

The first 40 lacs had been raised by officers newly appointed to several large districts, assisted by the bankers. It was now proposed to raise a similar sum by putting in new men and turning out the others. Nobody dared to mention "cession of territory" to the Nizam, and thus the vessel of the State drifted on without sail or helm to the rocks, on which it might go to pieces at any time. I was sorry for the Resident, who, if he trusted to Suraj-ool-Moolk's word, was sure to be deceived ; yet I believe Suraj-ool-Moolk had every wish to fulfil his promises if he could ; but there were literally no assets to work on, and no credit to be had, and all waited for Lord Dalhousie's next move.

In November I received a private and confidential note from the Ranee of Gudwall, a State smaller than Shorapoor, but occupying the same political position.

She knew of the prosperity at Shorapoor, and wished me to take charge of Gudwall in the same manner. The offer, spontaneous as it was, gratified me much, but unless I were placed in charge of the "Raichore Doab," in which her State lay, I could do nothing for her, and in any case I could not myself propose the measure. The Ranee was a woman of irreproachable character, and would, I felt sure, be easy to deal with.

In December I received orders to go to Beejapoor to meet the Commissioner of Sattara and the Collector of Sholapoor, who, with myself, were to form a commission for the investigation of lines of traffic and roads from all sides, with reference to the opening of a new port on the western coast at Viziadroog. I had been suffering much from fever and other ailments, and the change of air and scene was delightful to think of. I had never yet seen Beejapoor, and had longed to visit it for years, on account of its noble remains of Mussulman architecture. We met, and made out a report, which I had to write, and we were a very pleasant little party; but my chief delight was in sketching, in which I was unwearied, and found ever fresh objects for my brush. Had I had three months, instead of three weeks, to spend, I could not have half exhausted the subjects that presented themselves everywhere—palaces, mosques, interiors, exteriors, combinations of ruins and landscape, extended views, and choice “bits,” all most picturesque and beautiful. I brought away as many drawings as I could; but I would willingly have lingered had I had leisure.

As the majority of the Rajah was fast approaching, I drew up, at the Resident's request, a report upon the results of my management of Shorapoor from the commencement; and this he transmitted to the Governor-General, with a letter requesting instructions as to the date on which the Rajah's minority should expire, and proposing, on his own part, that I should remain at Shorapoor after that event, in the capacity of political agent on the part of the Government of India, on a salary of 1500 Co. rupees per month, to be paid by the State of Shorapoor. I did not think it likely that the Rajah would desire the presence of any political agent, if he were allowed the option, much less that he would agree to maintaining one at the cost of 20,000 rupees of the local currency; but the Resident's letter had gone on to the Government, and I could only await the reply. When it came it was very satisfactory.

“15th January 1853.

“SIR,—I am directed by the Most Noble the Governor-General to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated the 22d ult., No. 218, with its enclosures, and, in reply, to observe that the report upon the management of the affairs of Shorapoor exhibits results in the secured prosperity of the Prince, in the tranquillity of the State and contentment of the people, highly honourable to the industry, the perseverance, and the ability of Captain Meadows Taylor."

The period fixed for the majority of the Rajah was the completion of his eighteenth year; but in relation to the political agency, his lordship stated that "though it would be in the highest degree advisable, yet if, on attaining his full age, which the Rajah would then have reached, and finding his State orderly, and his means adequate to his expenditure, he should decline to comply with the suggestion, his lordship does not know on what grounds the Government of India could insist upon it." The question, therefore, was to be referred to the Court of Directors.

A few days after the receipt of the foregoing, I had the pleasure to receive from F. Courtenay, Esq., private secretary to the Governor-General, a letter, written privately, by desire of Lord Dalhousie, which assured me his lordship wished me to know that he had himself drafted the despatch before-quoted to General Fraser, and that he was glad of having had the opportunity of expressing his opinion of what I had done, and that, in regard to the blame he had attached to me on the proceedings of the Linsoogoor inquiry, he now completely exonerated me from it, being convinced, from the Ranec's dangerous and obnoxious intrigues and general ill-conduct in Mysore, that I had done no more than my duty in removing her from Shorapoor. Mr Courtenay added, in a postscript, "His lordship has read this, and desires me to say that you may consider it as having been written by himself."

Could I have wished or hoped for more? My friend, Major Johnston, was with me when the despatches arrived, and I sent for the Rajah to read them to him, and make over the executive authority in Shorapoor itself to him, as I had proposed to do that of several departments, informing him also at what period his minority would cease.

He took these communications in a very proper spirit—not greedily, but gratefully, and even sadly. "Till now," he said, "he had not felt his position or its reality; but he would try and be worthy of the confidence of Government." He seemed most anxious about his mother, whose conduct was now horribly profligate; and soon after his return to Shorapoor he tried to capture her chief favourite; but the man escaped at night, and the Ranee, in a furious rage, shut herself up in a far wing of the palace.

“What will they do,” he said, “when you leave them?” Though he did not love his mother, yet she had power over him to tempt him into vicious courses, and this she did not neglect to exercise.

In June I received the Resident's reply to my general report for the financial year, 1851-52, which was probably the last I should make, as the Rajah would soon have the management of his own treasury. The cash balance in the preceding year had been 377,334 rupees, the highest figure it had yet reached; this year it was 309,442; but the extra expenditure on public works—such as the new palace and the irrigation works, three large embankments being in progress—fully accounted for the diminution of the balance. Indeed I applied money as rapidly as I could to these useful undertakings, with a view to their future profit to the State. The great embankment and sluices at Kuchaknoor were now getting on fast; and I had the satisfaction of hearing from Major Buckle that “my plans, surveys, and estimates were most creditable to me as an engineer.”

The Resident's despatch ran thus:—

“Par. 37. As the time approaches when the Rajah will have attained his majority, and be intrusted, under the sanction of the Government of India, with the administration of his country, it becomes a matter of much interest to us to be assured that nothing has been wanting on our part to ameliorate the condition of the country and of its inhabitants during the time that it has been under our direction.

“Par. 38. On this subject, therefore, it is particularly gratifying to me to reflect that you have done honour to the office you have held, and that you have discharged its several important duties with the most marked ability, and a devotedness of time and labour that has had no intermission.”

The Nizam's affairs continued in the same deplorable condition. In June 1852 I had not received my pay for December 1851. I had long ago warned the Resident that he was being deceived, and he now began to acknowledge that I was right. What would be done? Would the Government of India demand a cession of territory for the pay of the Contingent only? or would the whole State be placed for a time under British surveillance? all the foreign mercenaries discharged, who were a perpetual source of uneasiness and disquiet, if not of actual alarm, and the establishment reduced so as to pay debts and leave the State prosperous? This was the Resident's advice; but at present no move was made in any direction.

I have not as yet alluded to my friend, the Rev. Mr Kies, whose occasional visits were a very great pleasure to me. He was a member of a German mission emanating from Basle, and supported by Germany.

He was so simple in his ways, and so learned at the same time, that he won the respect and esteem of the people wherever he went. He made no display, travelling on his stout pony from village to village, trusting to hospitality, which was never denied him, and meeting the learned Shastrees on their own ground, being fully versed in all their sacred books, and speaking Canarese perfectly. He and I had many a talk on the subject of missions and mission work, and his experience led him to believe that there were great numbers in many parts who were really dissatisfied with their own Hindooism, yet lacked courage to break through the trammels of caste, and separate themselves from Brahminical influences. That eventually the Christian faith would prevail, he did not doubt; but at present there was but little to show for the patient, humble teaching of many years of labour. In one note I had from Mr Kies, he told me that the priest of a village where he had previously preached the Gospel was dead, and with his last breath had laid injunctions on his people to receive him as their future Gooroo (spiritual teacher); and this they did, listening "simply and reverently."

Another letter I find, which is, I think, worthy of a place here.

"I am afraid, sadly afraid, that missionaries who go or who write home to Europe, make it appear as though they were securing more conversions, or hoped to do more, than they can effect. I think they have begun at the wrong end, by abusing Hindooism and idolatry, instead of meeting the natives on their own ground—the Shastras, their scriptures—and showing them how unreasonable, illogical, and void of all comfort they are compared with the belief of a Christian. The finest work they have, religious and philosophical, is the 'Bhagwat Gita,' an episode of the Mahabarat; but though there are fine thoughts in it, and fine doctrine, it rests upon no basis that the mind feels, and is intermixed with physical absurdities. You should, if you can, read Schlegel's Latin translation; it is the best, as being nearest to the original Sanscrit. There is an English version; but I do not know how to get hold of it. The missionaries are now, I believe, at last aware of the necessity of meeting natives on their own ground; but for thirty years it was not so, and the mass of vituperation of Hindoos that has been printed is enormous—at least what they consider vituperation. Put it to yourself, as for instance, in Italy, where there is much image-worship very like idolatry, would it answer any good purpose to call Saint this, a rogue? or Saint that, a thief? or Saint t'other, an impostor? Krishna deserves all these names; but it answers no good purpose to bestow them. I am often surprised at the supineness of the English chaplains of the Established Church. Missionaries take the trouble generally to learn at least one native language; but among English clergymen I do not know of one who really makes native languages his study, and many of them can hardly speak intelligibly to their servants. Why is this? Is there no field of work for them as well as for missionaries? no good to be done to natives around them? no translations to make? Of course there are. The work is plentiful; but it is not done. Good classical scholars generally find little difficulty in learning native languages; and why should not a chaplain preach in a plain, simple fashion, and be able to read the service to the natives at his station? Much good, it strikes me, might be done were this subject rightly considered."

Mr Kies was beloved and respected by all; and his visits were eagerly looked for. He laboured on as long as I continued in India; and I believe, at last, owing to ill health, returned to Basle, where he died—an honest, upright, humble follower of his Lord, and one who, by his simple faith and kindly feelings, won many converts.

In September, all being perfectly quiet and prosperous at Shorapoor, I went up to Hyderabad for medical advice. The Rajah had married his third wife, according to the custom of the family, and his first wife's half-sister had also been married at the same time to the Rajah of Soonda. She was one of my Shorapoor children, for whom I had always felt a great affection; she was so clever, and yet so gentle, and very handsome, and the Rajah of Soonda had fallen in love with her at first sight, and would not be refused. The expenses of these marriages, the ladies' trousseaux and their jewels, were very heavy—hardly less in all than a lakh of rupees; but the money was their own, and devoted to their own purposes.

At Hyderabad I was very ill ; the fever I had previously suffered from returned with great violence, and my life was almost despaired of. Under God's great mercy I again recovered, and felt far better than I had done for several months before I left. The Resident wished me to remain, pending the final instructions of the Governor-General regarding Hyderabad and the debts of the Nizam's Government, which were increasing every month. The Governor-General and the Resident were at issue in regard to the policy to be adopted with respect to the Nizam. The Resident proposed that the whole of his Highness's dominions should be placed under the management of the British Government, and all useless expenses reduced in order to pay the State debts, which were estimated at four millions and a half. Lord Dalhousie, on the other hand, protested very strongly against any interference with his Highness's affairs, which had been guaranteed by the British Government in the Treaty of 1800 ; and he required only a partial cession of territory to provide for the payment of the Contingent and liquidation of the debt to the Company. These views, so essentially different, were irreconcilable ; but I was not prepared for the result. The Resident came to me one evening and said, abruptly, “Taylor, I have sent in my resignation; I have just posted it myself, and I have told nobody—not even my wife; but I confide it to you. In a day or two it will be made public.”

I was much grieved. I had worked under him and with him for more than nine years without a difference, and his kindness, both officially and privately, had been uniform and continued, nor can I ever forget his unwearied care of me and attention in my illness.

While I was still at Hyderabad his resignation was accepted, and he began his preparations for departure. I left Hyderabad on the 26th December, bidding him good-bye with extreme regret. Colonel Low, who on a former occasion had acted for General Fraser, was appointed his successor, and would, it was presumed, bring with him the final orders of the Governor-General in Council. He was expected early in March, so I should not be long in suspense.

I returned to my districts, and began my last revenue settlement. There was but little to do; the period of five years had expired, and all that remained was a general revision and adjustment, with the remissions or other provision for outstanding balances. On the whole we had been unlucky as regarded seasons, and had had three bad, through excess of unseasonable rain, against two good. I could therefore make no demand for an increase of rent, and the leases for waste lands taken up had been necessarily irregular. A regular system of returns of cultivation and revenue, in all villages in correspondence with the treasury, worked well, and the most ordinary supervision on the part of the Rajah would keep everything straight. I had not been long in camp when the Rajah came out to me, and remained for a few days' shooting. He appeared, for the first time, restless, and somewhat petulant, wondering how soon the orders would arrive regarding him. I could only assure him he could not be more anxious than I was on the subject; but I could do nothing till they came. The Ranee had again been ill, and when her son visited her, had told him that unless he exerted himself he would never get the country out of my hands, and that he was now no child, "Why did he not act as a man?" No wonder, I thought, that he was petulant, and perhaps suspicious too. I had informed him of the probable political agency; and a draft of a letter was prepared from himself and others of the elder members of his family, declaring that no political agency was needed, and that the Rajah was fully able to manage his own concerns. Some signed these papers; but others, especially the Beydurs, refused to do so, except a few, who sent me word they had done it under compulsion. The Rancee, to her credit, declared to her son that he would ruin himself if these papers were forwarded. I never heard of them till afterwards, so I suppose the Rajah was guided by her counsel.

On March 10th the Resident wrote to the Rajah that the Court of Directors and the Governor-General approved of his taking up the affairs of his State; but they desired that I should remain as political agent to advise him in State matters, and thus preclude the recurrence of former disorder and irregularity: to this the Resident requested a distinct reply, which would be forwarded for the orders of the Governor-General. On receipt of this letter, the Rajah wrote to me asking the meaning of "political agent," which I explained, and he sent his reply to the Resident, which was at once forwarded; but the question of political agency was evaded under his assurance to Government that "his reliance in all matters was restricted to the favour of the Supreme Government."

Perhaps if the Rajah had been from the first assured that he would not have had to pay for the agency and its establishment, he would have consented to the step as a mark of distinction to his State, but the prospect of having to pay 20,000 rupees a-year was formidable. Lord Dalhousie had very distinctly given his opinion that the measure could not be forced upon the Rajah ; and even if he consented, he ought not to be considered responsible for the heavy charges it would involve. I had always looked on the subject as extremely uncertain ; for unless the Court of Directors sanctioned the expenditure, I did not see how the Governor-General could authorise it. Everything, however, must soon be finally settled.

The Rajah had come of age the previous October, and the delay in his public recognition by Government was only making him restless and suspicious. If the Rajah had agreed to the appointment of a political agent, I should of course have remained with him ; but I had no wish to do so for many reasons, and I wrote privately to Colonel Low on the subject. The rumours of a transfer of territory by the Nizam became again rife in April, and as I felt sure my services would not be passed over, I waited patiently for the issue. I could not have remained at Shorapoor ; but if I were given charge of the Raichore Doab, I could still look after it. The Rajah's vices were becoming notorious, and I cannot write of them ; and his temper, to his own people, was growing like his mother's.

The Rajah's answer to the Resident not being considered satisfactory by the Governor-General, the Resident again wrote, detailing the exact sum to be paid to the agent, 1815 Shorapoor rupees per month—equivalent to 1500 Government rupees—and there would be additional sums for sepoy's, &c. I was at Shorapoor, and the Rajah brought the letter to me, and asked me what he was to say.

"I cannot pay this large sum to any one," he said ; "you know I cannot."

Indeed I was of the same opinion, and thought the expenses might well have been shared by the Company and by the Nizam's Government.

"But," continued the Rajah, "I suppose they will be angry with me if I refuse, and, indeed, I don't want you to go away. I know I shall do no good when you are gone ; you don't know the people I have about me."

"Yes," I said, "I do, as well as you ; and if you only act rightly, you will be able to control them far more easily than I did."

"O appa !" he cried, leaving his chair, and throwing himself at my feet—"O appa ! if I were only a little boy again to lie in your arms, and for you to love me as you used ! All that is gone for ever."

"No, no," I answered ; "if I go—and I must go soon—I shall not be far away from you, and if you are in any trouble or difficulty send for me and I will come. You can always write in English 'Come,' and I shall understand."

"I will," he said. "I know, whatever you may hear, you will not forsake your boy."

And I gave him my promise. That, except once more, as I shall have to relate, was the last time I was ever alone with him. He wrote his answer to the Resident on the 1st May : it was clumsily worded, and Colonel Low did not like the style ; but the Rajah did not intend it to be disrespectful or arrogant. He declined the political agency on the terms on which it was offered, owing to the great expense ; and I thought him right.

Meanwhile events at Hyderabad were in full progress towards a settlement. The Resident had received his final orders, which were to demand that territory in payment of the Contingent might be ceded in perpetuity to British management, and the districts I had named in my minute of January 1851 were the basis of the transaction. The old Contingent was to be remodelled ; all the local officers pensioned, and the force no longer called the "Nizam's Army," but, as the "Hyderabad Contingent," to be an auxiliary one to the Government of India. Should any reader desire to refer to these transactions, they are to be found in their entirety in the Blue-book of 1854, April 4th, and are in truth very interesting, as explaining measures on which Lord Dalhousie has often been arraigned. The Nizam objected to the "assignment in perpetuity," and the treaty was duly executed and signed without that condition, leaving him at liberty to redeem the provinces if possible, at some future time.

I was still at Shorapoor. The Rance intended to go on a pilgrimage to one of the great temples in the south of India, and took leave of me in apparently real grief.

"Do you remember, Taylor Sahib," she asked, "what I once told you about that boy? You have not forgotten it?"

"No, Rance Sahib," I replied, "nor ever shall."

"Ah," she continued, "he is the last—the last of his race! He will lose all his ancestors ever gained; and all the pains you have taken with him, and all the money you have saved for him, will be poured like water into the sea; and you will be grieved—sorely, sorely grieved!"

But I shall not see it, for I am dying, my friend, dying fast now. Will you forgive me all that I have done to you? I am a mean old woman: you are going one way, and I am going another; we shall never meet again."

I bent over her as she lay upon her bed, and touched her hand with my lips. She could not speak; but smiled, waved her hand gently, and I left her.

Next day she went to Linsoogoor, and being again seized with paralysis, died there on the 27th May. She was but forty years old; but when I last saw her she seemed seventy, haggard and wasted almost to a skeleton. The Rajah rode over to see her the day before her death, but she was insensible, and he disgusted all those present by his levity and the unruly crowd he had with him.

He returned to Shorapoor while she was yet living, and made no attempt to attend her funeral rites. I called upon him the day after her death, according to Shorapoor etiquette, but he hardly mentioned his mother at all, except as having "been very foolish."

So ended the Rance Ishwarama.

If there were some good points in her character, generosity and charity to the poor, her profliggacy and baneful influence over her son were terrible to think on, and continued to have effect on him to the last.

Suraj-ool-Moolk, the Nizam's Minister, was dead ; and his nephew, Salar Jung, a most gentlemanly, well-educated young nobleman, had been appointed in his stead by the Nizam, with every prospect of success. He has since risen to the very highest eminence in India as a statesman, and by him the Nizam's State has been rescued from the decadence with which it was threatened.

I was now summoned to Hyderabad to receive instructions respecting the district that was to be given into my charge—which of the five that had been ceded was not made known to me. I arrived on the 11th June, and having reported myself, received a polite note from the Resident, asking me to come to dinner, as he had much to say. He received me most kindly, and I was charmed with him, he was so frank, and clear-headed, and decided in all his expressions ; and I saw, at once, that I should work happily under him. Next day the districts were assigned. At first I was given Berar, the largest ; but an express arrived from the Bombay Government particularly requesting that I might be given that portion of the ceded territory which lay contiguous to the Bombay Presidency, and I was nominated to that instead.

The following extract from an official letter from the Resident to me, was at once both explanatory and gratifying:—

“Para. 14. As I understand that you have felt surprised, and perhaps somewhat disappointed, at finding that districts of comparatively small extent are to be made over to your management, while larger districts are allotted to other Deputy-Commissioners of less experience in civil duties than yourself, I think it is due to you to assure you that the circumstance in question has not occurred from any want of confidence on my part in your qualifications or zeal for the public interests—indeed quite the reverse; for my original reason in determining to send you to the western districts was my belief that many of the duties in that quarter will be of a peculiarly difficult and delicate nature, arising from the numerous Surf-i-Khas districts in that quarter, the revenue management of which remains, according to agreement with the individuals who enjoy them, with the Nizam’s Government, while the police and judicial duties of those villages are to be conducted entirely under your orders.

“15. I may also mention that long-pending and intricate disputes respecting boundaries and frontier taxes, &c., &c., must be inquired into and settled in communication with the collectors of Ahmednugger and Sholapoor of the Honble. Company's territories ; and I knew that I could rely on your tact and judgment, and general experience in civil duties, for the purpose of bringing these disputes to a satisfactory conclusion. Moreover, I may as well mention the fact that it is within the last three days, and after the allotment of districts to the several Deputy-Commissioners had been arranged, that the western districts have been curtailed to their present extent at the particular request of the Nizam, who originally promised eight lakhs in that direction, making up the difference by adding lands to the southern portion of Berar. That fact, however, does not in any material degree alter the difficult duties above alluded to connected with the western districts, which I consider you so well qualified to overcome."

I had sent on all my tents and heavy baggage towards Berar by way of Beeder ; but I now recalled it, as I was required to go first to Shorapoor, and then to my new district : it was, in fact, part of my old district of 1828-29, and a fine healthy climate, which to me Berar was not ; and as one end bordered on Shorapoor, I should have no difficulty in getting there. The Raichore Doab, to which I had looked as my probable destination, was divided into two portions, and Berar into two, and mine appeared to be the largest in area, though not in revenue. “‘You won’t mind that,’” said the Resident, as I wrote to my father; “‘you: district requires a person of tact and experience of more than ordinary character, and therefore I send you’”—a flattering and gracious speech, for which I made due acknowledgment. It was curious that my destination should be so very suddenly changed.

The treaty, ratified by the Governor-General, had not as yet arrived from Calcutta; and as there was a great deal of detail to be arranged about the establishments and general management of the new districts, the Resident requested me to draw up a minute on the subject, which I did as rapidly as I could; and by the time the treaty had arrived, and the Nizam fixed the 18th July for a public darbar to receive and sign it, my minute was ready. On the appointed day, the Resident, accompanied by a numerous staff, of which I was one, went to the darbar. His Highness was in excellent humour, chatted freely and gaily with Colonel Low, and seemed highly pleased that the differences between the two Governments had been so speedily and so amicably arranged. Next day, I and the other new civil officers who were at Hyderabad received our credentials, and there being no need for further delay, I returned to Shorapoor to make my final arrangements, and to give over my charge to the Rajah according to the instructions I had received. Lord Dalhousie had not been particularly pleased with the tone of the Rajah's reply to his despatch, which he characterised as "presumptuous;" yet, as there was no pretext for compelling him to retain the services of a political agent, he directed that the State should be made over to him, at the same time warning him—

"That if he allowed his country to fall into disorder, the Supreme Government would interfere and establish order," or perhaps set him aside altogether.

I had appointed the 30th June for the final ceremony, and had written to tell the Rajah to be ready. On my way to Shorapoor I fell in with Captain Balmain, who had been appointed to Western Raichore, and took him on with me. My future assistant, Lieutenant Cadell, awaited me also at Shorapoor. I will give the detail of the last few days from my letter to my father, written at the time.

“I had prepared proclamations and other documents directing all persons to obey the Rajah, and Cadell and I went to the palace in the evening. There were many people present, and the letter from the Governor-General was first read ; then my proclamation ; and I made a short speech, saying I hoped that all present would be faithful to the Rajah, and serve him as they had served me—that I trusted they would do so, and take care of the State, and not relapse into evil ways.

“Then, as I hung a garland of flowers about the Rajah’s neck, and gave the State seals into his hand, a royal salute was fired, and the ceremony ended.

“The Rajah seemed to take it all very coolly and as a matter of course, and said nothing ; but he whispered to me that he could not say all he would in such a crowd ; but would send for me, or come up to me in a day or two.

“We remarked that there was no manifestation of satisfaction among the assembly, or among the crowds outside the palace ; on the contrary, many were weeping.

“The Rajah’s first act was to seize his illegitimate half-sister, or rather take her away from her mother, and marry her by a left-handed ceremony, obliging the members’ of his family to be present, to their great disgust. For two days he was busy with this ceremony, offerings at temples, and the like, and on the 3d Jnly he wrote to me, begging I would come to him in the evening.

“He asked me what he should write to the Governor-General, and I gave him verbally the outline of a plain grateful letter. He then asked to be allowed to purchase my house, which was a great satisfaction to me, and he offered 20,000 rupees, an offer I gladly accepted, provided Government made no objection. He afterwards sent every one away, and spoke about his affairs more sensibly than I had ever heard him do before; and as he gave me this opening I improved upon it, and showed him how, during the short time he had managed his affairs, he had already contrived to spend every rupee of ready money—how his servants and soldiers were even now in arrears of pay, as was the case in his father’s time, and he himself obliged to borrow here and there in advance of the collections. I told him I did not see what it would all come to if he did not take pains to make things better, and much to the same purpose, when he began to sob, and cling about me, saying he had now no friends, and how he was to get on he did not know, but he would do his best. He said he saw there was no use in soldiery, which his people told him were necessary (this was in relation to the proposed enlistment of Arabs and Rohillas, which I had heard was intended), and that he would discharge many of them, and reduce his extra expenses. He then told me there was one thing which he wished me to know, and which had long been on his mind—namely, that if he died without legitimate issue he wished the British Government to annex his State, and provide for his family and dependants. I begged he would write this in a letter to the Resident, which I undertook to forward; but I represented that he was very young, and that I hoped to hear of his having a family and an heir.

“In such conversation our time passed, and I mentioned everything I could think of in regard to the future management of the affairs. He said he did not know how to thank me, or show his gratitude; but that if he were permitted to settle on me an allowance for life, and a village or two for my maintenance, as a proof of his regard, he would be thankful.

“The next day he asked Cadell and me to dine with him. The letters, including that about my estate, were all ready, and were duly forwarded on the 7th July. The village selected for me was an outlying one within the British territory, and yielded 2500 Company's rupees, or £250 a-year, and I shall be very lucky if I get it.

"The following day—Cadell having started in the morning—I went to the palace to bid the Rajah good-bye; and not only he, but all the members of the family, and the chief people, male and female, in Shorapoor.

"It was a painful process; there were crowds of people all about me, clinging to my palankeen, as I went from house to house. The Rajah had gone out to one of his hunting retreats, leaving word that he could not bear to see me go. As I proceeded, the people and the Beydurs, men and women, gathered in the streets, and accompanied me, and it was as much as I could do to get away at all. The Rajah's wives, whom I had known as children, elung about me. Poor old Kesámá, now nearly ninety years old, blessed me: 'I cannot weep,' she said, 'my old eyes are dry; but I bless you, you and all belonging to you.'

"It was a most exciting scene, and very painful. Mine has been a long sojourn among a strange people, and whatever may have been their faults, there was no doubt of their warm attachment to myself."

The crowds followed me to the gates; but as my bearers quickened their pace the numbers soon fell off. At every village I was met by the people, and at the last one on the frontier a great concourse had assembled of all the head-men, pateils, and putwarries, and principal farmers. I do not think there was even one man who had a hope of the Rajah's maintaining his position, and as to themselves, they said — "We must escape oppression as best we can. It will be a hard struggle."

So ended my connection with Shorapoor for the present. It was hereafter renewed for a time under far different circumstances. I had tried humbly and earnestly to do my duty to its people of all degrees; and could I give in extenso my long letters to my father, they would show more of what my inner life and occupations were, and of my schemes and plans for the welfare of the State. They are far too monotonous, however, and all I have been able to do is to note such events, and quote such extracts, as would give some notion of my endeavours and their results.

In one of his despatches General Fraser characterised the State of Shorapoor as "a wild and barbarous district, replete with disorder and irregularity of every conceivable kind." And no doubt it was so when I took over charge. The Beydurs were the same, and their power was the same as in the time of Aurungzeeb, or indeed from the fifteenth century, and their feudal condition of service to their chief was the same. Sometimes, owing to their numbers and position, they had been able to dominate over all classes of the people; sometimes their power had exceeded that of their own chiefs, and had forced these to act as they pleased. Sometimes the Rajahs had in their turn brought them to submission; but they had never bent to any Mussulman or other foreign yoke, and none of the civilisation that such a process insured had ever reached them. As long as times were disturbed, they plundered at their will throughout the Deccan and Mysore, and it was only when stronger and more peaceful Governments had the rule that they were restrained. But if the old raids and forays could not be indulged in, there were at any rate cattle-lifting and dacoity, and other crimes, to fall back upon; and they looked upon these as most honourable achievements until the late interference with Shorapoor by the British Government.

This violence I had at least suppressed, and for years before I left there had not been one single complaint of any such doings beyond the frontier.

One of their systems, however, was not easy to eradicate. A man who had a quarrel with his village for any cause could always obtain the aid of Beydurs willing to take his part as a point of honour, and these proceeded to issue threatening notices, such as—

“To the authorities of ——. In the name of Mahadeo !

“The fire is on the hills! We are out on murder and violence because you have injured ——, and you had better settle with him.”

If this notice were obeyed, all was well ; if not, the people of the village were kept in perpetual alarm, their crops injured, and persons wounded, indeed often killed. This state of things was bad enough in the country itself, but when it extended to parties across the frontier it was far worse.

On one occasion a man of a small village near the river Bheema quarrelled with his family, and went to the Beydurs of Adoor, which was fifteen miles distant, in the Nizam's country, where about a thousand of them were to be found. He returned with a party, who harried the Shorapoor village, burnt corn-stacks, and wounded the headman desperately, besides seven others, also sending me an impudent message that the Shorapoor Beydurs were cowards and old women. My Beydurs were furious, and asked me to lead them on to avenge this insult; and I daresay they thought meanly of me because I did not. As the Nizam's local authorities would or could give no redress, I appealed to the Resident, who desired me not to stir, and sent down a detachment of infantry to march on the rebel village. It resisted, was stormed, and afterwards burnt; and some of my Beydurs were present, which was a satisfaction to them, though they would rather have gone under me. Not long after the offenders sent a deputation to me, praying for forgiveness, and they never transgressed again. They invited me to come and visit them, which I did, finding them on a fine level plateau — a much cooler climate than the plain.

As a body the Shorapoor Beydurs had been free from crime. They were not dishonest, and there was no petty thieving or roguery among them; they used to say they were too proud for that sort of thing. Though scarcely belonging to any caste, they were not given to intoxication, and rarely drank spirits; few even touched sendhee, which is the sap of the palm, fermented in a peculiar manner, and very exciting. In the years that I had been at Shorapoor there were, I think, only two murders among them. They never dreamt of resisting authority in such cases, but gave up the offenders to justice at once. In civil cases I never interfered with their usages, and they never complained of injustice. Their bhatts, or bards, and their elders, had a traditional knowledge of their laws and customs, and always attended the punchayets; but I do not think there was much difference between their law and that of the Hindoos.

The elders of the clans sat every day on their platform, under the great neem tree in the town, and attended to all complaints. They were grateful to me for respecting their former privileges, and elected me goorekar, or head executive over all the clans. They certainly never abused their claims, and by working well as rural police saved me both labour and anxiety. I was very thankful that during my stay no blood had been shed, nor a single shot fired in anger among them.

All the members of the clans had had lands allotted for their original support, which had descended hereditarily. The minimum amount was one cooroo, or thirty beegahs, but some held as much as three hundred beegahs nominal. Ordinarily they farmed these lands themselves, and divided the produce, but never the land, among the family. When general security began to prevail, many took leases for waste lands, and were assisted by me with capital; but it often surprised me to see how much was cleared and planted by them without help. I opened out to them also a new occupation, that of carriers of cotton, and other Shorapoor products, to the coast; and of salt, spices, and English piece-goods from the coast,—and this business was proving very profitable. I introduced the best seed of cotton and other produce that I could get, and established a small manufacture of indigo, and tried by every means in my power to promote peaceful and civilised undertakings. I think, and hope, that I left these wild people better than I found them; they certainly were more prosperous. They were highly honourable, and once they had really solemnly sworn faith to me they never swerved. Not even their Rajah could tempt them when he tried; and they told him very sternly that they had pledged their faith to me, and till I made them over to him they would not break it—nor did they.

As a class these men were fine athletic fellows, constantly exercised in gymnastics and in the use of arms. They lived well, eating no meat except game, and they were comfortably housed, their habitations having solid mud, or mud and stone walls, and clay terraced roofs. There was no savagery among them, such as prevails among the Bheels and Gonds, and other tribes.

Their ordinary dress was a pair of loose trousers, of cotton cloth, descending to the calf of the leg; a turban, and waistband, with a chintz tunie for festal occasions. Their hunting or war costume was a brown leather cap, gathered in round the head; brown leather drawers over the cotton ones; and a leather jerkin or jacket without sleeves: they only carried swords. Their women were well made, strong and hardy, and very cleanly in their persons and in their homes, and were excellent housewives, making their husbands' clothes, spinning yarn for the weavers, and working in the fields, watering crops, and suchlike. It was rare to hear of a Beydur having more than one wife, and they were kind to their women as a rule.

The moral character of these people was very high, and such infidelities as did rarely occur were tried among themselves at their own punchayets. They were very illiterate, and considered it "low" to be able to read or write, or cast accounts. That was the work of Brahmins ! They joined in some of the Brahminical observances of the State, and the Dussera, and the Ooaydee or Bussunt, were always attended by them. The Dussera I have before mentioned as a State pageant ; the Bussunt, or Springtide, was very different. In the morning all the clans in Shorapoor assembled on the hills around, dressed in clothes dyed yellow, and accompanied by their horn-blowers, drummers, flag-bearers, and pipers, marched to the open space before the great temple on the terrace where the Rajah and I used to sit. Games were then begun—wrestling, leaping, &c. ; but that most appreciated was climbing the poles. Six of these, from twenty to thirty feet high, were put up, each with a small pavilion at the top, in which sat a man provided with jars of some slippery mixture. Large slices of pumpkin hung from the bottom of this cage, and the feat was to tear away one or more of these slices, and it was no easy task. Four, six, or eight stout fellows placed themselves round the base of the pole, others climbed on their shoulders, others again upon them, and so on, until one essayed to swarm from the last to the top, amidst clapping of hands and shouting. Meanwhile the man in the cage diligently emptied his jars of slippery stuff and water over them all, and often the whole structure would collapse, and the men fall in a heap. When any fellow, stronger and more fortunate than the rest, did succeed in snatching away the prize, the excitement was unbounded, and he was brought in triumph to the Rajah to receive his reward. These people also had a very popular game, which closely resembled prison-bars; and I taught them leap-frog, taking a back myself at first; and I have seen hundreds flying merrily over each other. I also introduced racing in sacks, which caused great amusement. Besides these sports, they had marbles, peg-tops, hop-scotch, and trap, as well as kite-flying, each in its season, as with us; and it was curious to find these games amongst a people who had never known the English; they were played, too, exactly in the same manner as with us, and are universal throughout India. Beydurs are keen sportsmen; with their sharp spears they attack panthers, wild hog, and often even tigers, fearlessly. They are skilled at hawking, both with large falcons and sparrow-hawks, training the latter to kill quail, larks, and snipe; and the former, partridges, wild duck, floricen, and hares. The last mentioned, however, were generally drawn into nets, and then knocked on the head with sticks. A sporting Beydur, "specially got up," was a very grand fellow indeed. He wore a large handkerchief tied round his head, of some showy pattern in brilliant colours. In the centre of his forehead was a large patch of crimson, which was brought down to the end of his nose, and across his eyes he had drawn his hand covered with dry ashes. Dabs of crimson ornamented his back, round which a delicate muslin scarf of some bright colour was brought and tied in a bow, the ends being finished with some gold tinsel ribbon, which hung down in front. Round his loins was wound a strong piece of cloth, with a knife stuck in at the waist. His trousers, tight round the body, looser to the knee, and after that very wide to the ankle, are generally white, or of pale salmon colour. His sandals are nicely oiled; and altogether, with his falcon or sparrow-hawk on his wrist, his two dogs at his heels, and a stout quarterstaff in his hand, he was an imposing, handsome-looking fellow, and was quite aware of the fact! Some wear gold ear-rings, silver rings above the elbow round the arm, and silver waist-chain. Sometimes a father took his little son out with him; and these juvenile "swells," dressed exactly to resemble their fathers, sparrow-hawk and all, were very amusing.

I need not attempt to describe the ordinary classes. They resembled most others of the Deccan, mixed Mussulman and Hindoo, but were ruder in manners than the corresponding classes in the British and Mussulman territories of the Nizam. They were industrious farmers, and the way in which they reared and cultivated American cotton-seed, and applied their capital to increase the produce of their country, was admirable. They were litigious and quarrelsome. In heavy criminal cases I employed courts, or punchayets, of the chief persons at Shorapoor, Lingayets, Hindoos, and Mussulmans, without exclusiveness as to their class, and including members of the Rajah's family; a President was then selected, and specific charges or indictments made against the prisoners. The evidence for prosecution and defence was recorded, and the court gave written judgment, which contained summing up and sentence. I found this plan very simple and efficacious, and the proceedings were always carried on with the greatest regularity. Where sentence of death was recorded, as in murders, the judgment was translated by me, with the evidence and defence, and forwarded, through the Resident, to the Governor-General for confirmation; and I had not one instance of disapproval to record. Cases involving fine and imprisonment, with hard labour or without it, I used to try myself. No law had ever existed in Shorapoor, nor even the semblance of a court of justice, civil or criminal. Ordinary civil suits were tried by civil punchayets not limited to five members, and there were but few appeals to me from their decisions.

The population of the principality by census was about 500,000, or 130 to the square mile. The town itself and its suburbs 30,000.

The public dispensary and hospital at Shorapoor were very useful, and medicines were dispensed under the orders of the apothecary attached to the staff. In visitations of cholera, medicines were sent out into the districts, and competent persons despatched in charge of them. Vaccination made great progress at Shorapoor; and in the country, I myself was the chief operator, my tents being surrounded every morning by crowds of women and children so long as my supplies of lymph lasted or could be obtained.

My school at Shorapoor was well attended, and both Mahratta and Teloogoo, with Persian to Musulman boys, were well taught. I had even a few English scholars, some of whom turned out well. In the districts there were plenty of schools, where Canarese and Mahratta were taught; and to these I gave small grants in aid, and books which were used in the schools of the British provinces.

I have already spoken of what I had begun and done in public works. The lake at Bohnal was a complete success, and had repaid the money spent upon it several times over. The other irrigation works were incomplete, and there was but small hope that the Rajah would carry them on, although he promised very faithfully to do so. One grand scheme I formed—that of diverting the waters of the river Krishna from their bed, and bringing them through most part of the principality for irrigation purposes—had to be abandoned for want of funds, though perfectly practicable, as I had ascertained by levels.

I had made and cleared many roads, one of which extended to Linsoogoor, through a wild and rocky track, for 36 miles, and opened up traffic between Shorapoor and the south.

I had planted many thousand mango and tamarind trees about the town and elsewhere, intended both for ornament and produce. When I left, the road to the Krishna, six miles in length, was bordered on each side by a double row of fine young trees, which gave ample promise of fruit. All these undertakings were gradually accomplished without distressing the 'revenue in any way ; indeed there were ample funds for all such contingencies.

I have not the final returns of the revenue at hand to refer to ; but I know that it was nearly, if not quite doubled ; and with the average liberal expenditure, there was a surplus of a lakh and a half. There were no debts whatever now, and I think, when I made over charge to the Rajah, that the State possessed every element of comfort and independence that could insure prosperity ; but there was small hope of its continuance.

Even in the brief period that had already elapsed the Rajah had spent every anna he found in the treasury, had not paid the stipendiaries, and had only the usual year's revenue to look to. My warnings on this point had been quite fruitless.

I need say little of myself. Since my great sorrow I had led a cheerless, lonely life ; no society, no one to speak to from first to last, except the very rare visit of a friend or traveller. The palace children often came to see me, and loved to hold their dolls' feasts among my flowers with their playmates. Native friends would come up in the evenings, and a game of chess with one or other often followed. In the country, the village authorities would gather round to hear of England and the world beyond India, of which they had no conception whatever. Sometimes travelling minstrels or singers, accredited from other courts, such as Mysore, Baroda, Gwalior, or elsewhere, arrived, and the State hospitality was exercised, and performances given and attended, and on these occasions I gave my parties.

Neighbouring "lairds" had to be received and entertained, for Shorapoor had to maintain its character for hospitality and kindly feeling to those adjoining it.

My books were my constant delight, and with these and my telescope, a fine Dollond, I had always plenty of occupation. I read up Herschel, and other works on astronomy, to enable me to understand something of what I saw. Night after night I have thus wandered about those glorious fields of the heavens, ever new, ever resplendent, leading thought irresistibly into the Infinite. I could not go on with literary work, as, at the day's close, my brain was generally wearied out. My work was seldom less than twelve hours a day, with little variation, so to write was impossible; but I felt I was gaining more and more real knowledge of native life and character, under circumstances that fall to the lot of very few Englishmen, and that hereafter, if life were spared, I might turn my experience to good account. I kept up voluminous private correspondence, particularly with my father; and this, with my usual letters to the 'Times,' official reports and translations, and occasional articles for the Indian press, were all I could manage to get through in my busy life. I was very thankful for the many blessings given me, and tried to discourage the feeling of utter loneliness that would at times oppress me.

Ten years of my life were given to Shorapoor—a blank to me in many respects as regarded intellectual intercourse and literary progress; but yet, with all its drawbacks, more interesting than the dull routine of a small cantonment.

Now they had passed over, and a new phase of my life was opening before me in an enlarged and more important sphere of action. Through all danger, through all illnesses and weariness and trials, I had been mercifully preserved and tenderly protected, and was grateful to God for His great mercies—praying that in the future they might be continued unto me.

CHAPTER XIII.

ALTHOUGH suffering from a severe attack of acute rheumatism, I, with my assistant, Lieut. Cadell, pressed on to Sholapoor, where it was necessary that I should meet the Collector, who congratulated me very heartily on my appointment to the district, which joined his own, and we could work together with good accord, and looked forward to much pleasant intercourse from time to time.

My assistant had no knowledge whatever, or experience, in civil affairs ; but I thought it best to place him at once in a prominent position, and to give him general directions which, as he was very clever and willing, I thought would suffice. I therefore made over to him part of the small establishment I had collected, and directed him to take possession of all the ceded districts which lay along the left bank of the Seenah river, between it and the range of hills that formed the "Bálá Ghât," or upper portion of the whole province; and with an escort of cavalry he set out to do what he could.

Fortunately the cession had been made at the close of the financial year, so there was no confusion of demand and account between the outgoing administration and the incoming one. I did not anticipate any opposition; but the British forces at Sholapoor and Ahmednugger had been warned to hold themselves ready to assist me in case any resistance might be made.

Nuldroog had been fixed upon as my headquarters, and I proceeded there without delay. I found a squadron of the Contingent cavalry encamped without the fort, which was in the possession of a large body of Arabs, who refused to allow the cavalry to enter, and whose temper appeared very doubtful.

At first, too, I was refused admittance. Their chief declared that he held a large mortgage on the fort and its dependencies, and that his men were in arrears of pay, and that until all his demands were settled, or I gave him a guarantee from the British Government that they would be settled, he would not give me up the fort. I, however, took no notice of his demands whatever. I told him the Nizam's Government was the only one with which he could have dealings, and that if he and his men did not at once march out, I had no resource but to summon the military force at Shorapoor, when I could not answer for the consequences. All the Arabs blustered a great deal, but finally retired inside to consider matters; and a message was brought to me in the evening, to the effect that in the morning the fort would be given up. And so it was; and as soon as they had bivouacked outside on the esplanade, I marched in at the head of my splendid cavalry escort, hoisted the English flag I had with me, and took possession forthwith. I should have regretted exceedingly if the obstinacy of these Arabs had brought about any collision, for their example was looked to by all the various parties of Arabs in the province; and had they resisted my authority, all the rest would have done so too, and the Arab chiefs of Hyderabad were almost in possession of the whole tract.

They held it in assignment for their pay and debts; and it was a convenient district for them, as fresh men could constantly reach them from Bombay and the coast without attracting observation, and be forwarded to Hyderabad to reinforce the main body. Also many private individuals living at Hyderabad possessed estates and villages in the province, and had mortgaged them to the Arabs—so that, in point of fact, the whole area was under their control, with very little exception ; and the tenacity with which they stuck to their possessions, whether for arrears of pay or any other monetary consideration, had been too often experienced to be doubted now. The Arabs in my fort of Nuldroog could not have held it against any force, as the guns were useless ; but had they continued their opposition, our occupation of the country would have assumed a very different aspect, and might have caused a disturbance and collision with the Arabs at Hyderabad—a consequence which would have had, in all likelihood, serious results. नयते

Although I had often before been at Nuldroog, I had never seen the interior of the fort, nor the English house belonging to it, which had been built by the late Nawab, who in old times had been a great friend of mine. The ladies of his family had used it, and now it was to become my residence. I found it a handsome building, although not very commodious. In the centre was a large hall, with two semicircular rooms on each side ; above the hall, a bedroom of corresponding size, with bath-room attached, from which there was a beautiful view all over the fort, the town, and the adjacent country. In front there was a broad veranda, supported upon pillars, and near at hand the portion set apart for the zenana, and which was still occupied by the ladies, who were to leave shortly. In the fort itself were several massive buildings, terraced and bomb-proof, which had been used in former days as barracks, hospital, powder-magazine, and guard-houses. There were also some other good native houses—all empty now, but useful for my English clerks and escort, and for conversion into treasury, jail, and public cucherry, or court, until more commodious buildings could be erected, or possibly another head station fixed upon.

The fort of Nuldroog was one of the most interesting places I had ever seen. It enclosed the surface of a knoll or plateau of basalt rock, which jutted out into the valley or ravine of the small river Boree from the main plateau of the country, and was almost level. The sides of this knoll were sheer precipices of basalt, here and there showing distinct columnar and prismatic formation, and varied from 50 to 200 feet in height; the edge of the plateau being more or less 200 feet above the river, which flowed at the base of the precipice on two sides of the fort. Along the crest of the cliff, on three sides, ran the fortifications, bastions, and curtains alternately, some of the former being very firmly built of cut and dressed basalt, and large enough to carry heavy guns, and the parapets of the machicolated curtains were everywhere loopholed for musketry. On the west side the promontory joined the main plateau by a somewhat contracted neck, also strongly fortified by a high rampart, with very roomy and massive bastions; below it a fausse-braye, with the same; then a broad, deep, dry ditch, cut for the most part out of the basalt itself; a counterscarp, about 20 or 25 feet high, with a covered-way; and beyond it, a glacis and esplanade up to the limits of the town.

The entire circumference of the enceinte might have been about a mile and a half, and the garrison in former times must have been very large, for nearly the whole of the interior was covered by ruined walls, and had been laid out as a town with a wide street running up the centre. All the walls and bastions were in perfect repair, and the effect of the fort outside was not only grim and massive, but essentially picturesque.

Nuldroog held a memorable place in local history. Before the Mussulman invasion in the fourteenth century, it belonged to a local Rajah, who may have been a feudal vassal of the great Rajahs of the Chalukya dynasty, A.D. 250 to 1200, whose capital was Kullianee, about 40 miles distant; but I never could trace its history with any certainty, and during the Hindoo period it was only traditional. The Bahmany dynasty, A.D. 1351 to 1480, protected their dominions to the west by a line of massive forts, of which Nuldroog was one; and it was believed that the former defences, which were little more than mud walls, were replaced by them with fortifications of stone. Afterwards, on the division of the Bahmany kingdom, in A.D. 1480, Nuldroog fell to the lot of the Adil Shahy kings of Beejapoor; and they, in their turn, greatly increased and strengthened its defences. It was often a point of dissension between the Adil Shahy and the Nizam Shahy potentates—lying, as it did, upon the nominal frontier between Beejapoor and Ahmednugger—and was besieged by both in turn, as the condition of the walls on the southern face bore ample testimony, as well from the marks of cannon-balls as from breaches which had afterwards been filled up. In 1558 Ali Adil Shah visited Nuldroog, and again added to its fortifications, rebuilt the western face, and constructed an enormous cavalier near the eastern end, which was upwards of 90 feet high, with several bastions on the edges of the cliff; but his greatest work was the erection of a stone dam across the river Boree, which, by retaining the water above it afforded the garrison an unlimited supply. I quote from a letter to my father, written a few days after my arrival:—

“I was greatly delighted and surprised by the view from the back of the house, where there is a balcony. You look up and down a valley, in which there is a fine brawling stream; and about a quarter of a mile below the house a huge dam of solid masonry has been built across the ravine, which holds the water back, and forms a pretty little lake. Above this, on the south side, the walls of the fort are built on the side of a precipice of about 50 feet to the water's edge, and the tall grim bastions have a fine effect. The dam connects the main fort with one opposite to it on a knoll on the north of the lake, whose bastions and curtains extend down the north side of the ravine; so on looking down you see the two forts, one on each side of the valley, the lake between, and the precipices beyond. The dam is truly wonderful—it is 90 feet high, 300 yards long, and 100 feet broad at the top. The river at its ordinary height runs over the crest of the dam in channels arched over, and the water falls into the pool ; but when there is a flood, the whole of the water runs over the crest of the dam, forming a huge cataract, and is indeed a magnificent spectacle. About the centre of the dam there is a flight of steps by which you descend into a small, beautifully-ornamented room, in the Saracenic-Gothic style ; and there is a very ingenious contrivance by which, even when the river is in full flood and the cataract falling in front of the balcony of the room, the water which comes down the staircase is turned off down a tunnel in another direction, and cannot enter the room. The look-out from this apartment is extremely picturesque—the great pool below, the sides of the ravine clothed with shrubs and creepers, and the brawling waters as they run down the valley, forming altogether a striking and very beautiful picture, of a character I had never before seen.”

It may easily be imagined that I was quite content with my new quarters ; and in a few days' time, when all the rooms had been well washed out, and the broken panes in the excellent English glass doors and windows repaired, my pictures hung up, my precious books unpacked, and some furniture and carpets I had brought with me placed in the large room, the result was a very comfortable apartment. There was, too, a good garden about the house, which was very soon cleaned up, and eventually became one of my greatest pleasures—for nowhere that I had been in India did English flowers and vegetables grow so well; and there were several fine orange-trees and vines too, which, when properly looked after, gave abundant produce, as did the other fruit-trees, with which the garden was well stocked.

My first task was to take stock of my new province. Its boundaries had been ill defined at Hyderabad, and had to be rectified before the whole could be brought well together. To the west, the river Seenah, from a point nine miles from Ahmednugger to its junction with the Bheema, formed an excellent general line. Inside this lay portions of British territory belonging to the Collectorate of Sholapoor; but that did not signify. To the north a range of mountains, which bordered the valley of the Godavery, formed another distinct frontier. The river Manjera, which flowed eastwards, rising among these mountains, gave another distinctly-defined boundary to a certain point, where it diverged ; and from this point to Afzulpoor on the Bheema, an arbitrary line had been drawn, which, as it included several large counties that were private estates belonging to one of the chief nobles of Hyderabad, could not be attached. Within the general boundary too, many portions had either been wilfully concealed or improperly and dishonestly retained. However, the whole province, as defined in the treaty, would have been more than was really required ; and in the end, after I had gone over the whole carefully, my boundaries became more definite, and it was satisfactory to think that all the country lying within them was under my own control.

As fast as I could get them, I despatched managers to the different head-centres of counties with my orders, and to convey my assurances of goodwill to the people. The Arabs were fast betaking themselves to Hyderabad, and neither my assistant nor I had experienced any except very temporary difficulties from them. In almost less than one month I was able to report that we had established the authority of the British Government of India in every part of the province. My assistant's father, Mr Cadell, was an eminent Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh; and I was much amused when he wrote to his son that the proceedings of two men, with a small escort of cavalry, taking possession coolly of a province half as large as Scotland, with a strange population, were, to his perception, the "most consummate piece of assurance" he had ever heard of; and "pray, how were we going to govern it?" Our district was rather more than 15,000 square miles in area; but though the shrewd old Scotch lawyer saw, I daresay, a thousand difficulties, I saw none which could not be overcome by patience, hard work, and steady perseverance.

It was a fine climate, fortunately, and very healthy. The tract lying between the Seenah river and the hills was lower than the rest; but it was open, free from jungle, and for the most part well cultivated. From it the basalt plateau named the "Bálá Ghât" rose to a height varying from 400 to 1000 feet, some of the highest summits showing 2400 feet above the level of the sea. This plateau, culturable from its very edge, sloped gradually eastwards to the Manjera river, and joined the northern mountain boundary, which extended to Ahmednugger.

climate, even during the hottest part of the year, was much less trying, while in the cold season it was very cold indeed, and not unfrequently frosty.

The "Bálá Ghât" was renowned all through the Deccan for its luxuriant crops of wheat and barley, pulse and oil-seed. Cotton did not thrive, and what was produced was of very short fibre, harsh and unfit for export. Sugar-cane grew well, and there was a good supply of hemp and linseed; but the beautiful white millet of Shorapoor was wanting, and that grown was coarse and hard in comparison.

I had known the people before, when I was a boy, and many still remembered me and my red trousers, and came to see me. The population was almost entirely agricultural—thrifty, industrious, practical farmers and gentry, who tilled their somewhat hard soil with singular perseverance and success; they were better farmers than those at Shorapoor, and kept improving their fields till they would have done credit to an English landowner.

I had liked the people in my early days because of their sturdy, independent character. Mahratta was the only language spoken, and this I had at my command—a circumstance which, I felt sure, would inspire confidence, for everybody soon knew that they could come to me and speak out their minds freely whenever they had occasion, without any go-between, or interpretation, being necessary. I knew, too, that the normal crime of the district, dacoity, not only still existed, but was largely and desperately practised—and this, which had defied me in former years, must now be eradicated with a strong hand.

I believe that the people at large, with the exception of the small portion forming the hereditary criminal class, welcomed the new rule with sincere delight. They knew it meant security of their land and possessions, as well as justice and protection, and extension and protection of trade. Those who were unacquainted with the working and ways of English rule in other districts were, perhaps, somewhat disturbed at first at the idea, but they were few, and the feeling soon wore off.

When I took possession of the province, there was no court of law or justice whatever, civil or criminal, any more than there had been at Shorapur, and none such had ever existed within the memory of any person. The agents of the Nizam's Government, and the Arabs, used to punish gross criminal offences, and, in some cases, petty thefts; but in the great crime of dacoity all seemed to have had a share, inasmuch as the agent always received part, according to his share, of the property stolen! As for murder, no one ever noticed it, or thought of bringing the perpetrators to account.

After a great deal of very hard work—during almost night and day while it lasted—I had gained, partly from old accounts and partly from the details sent in from my new managers, a tolerably correct estimate of the resources of the province, which I submitted in a report to the Resident.

If I had taken the province according to the estimates and orders of transfer of the late Minister and the duftardars of Hyderabad, I should have had a revenue of about two and a half lakhs, and a few scattered portions of territory, and there would have remained within my boundary-line large tracts of country not under my jurisdiction. This would have caused much confusion and vexatious embarrassment, and probably constant disputes would have arisen. Now, when I had got all together in a kind of ring-fence, as it were, I found, according to my rough estimate, that I should have about eleven and a half lakhs of Hyderabad rupees.

Colonel Low was just going away to Calcutta to be sworn in as a member of the Supreme Council ; and before he went, he wrote me his very hearty approval of what I had been able to effect in so short a time, and particularly his great satisfaction at the complete and bloodless expulsion of the Arabs.

I must here, likewise, record my grateful thanks and remembrance of the very essential services rendered to me in respect to the latter by the native officers and men of the cavalry detachments sent for my assistance. The native officers were all gentlemen by birth, most intelligent, and highly respected by the people wherever they went. They proved excellent negotiators, and were fully trusted by all, even by the Arabs themselves. सत्यमेव जयते

At Owsa, a far stronger fort than Nuldroog, my manager presented my letter to the Arab chief commanding the garrison, requesting him to evacuate the place. The request was indignantly refused ; but on the appearance of a squadron of cavalry which I sent to my officer's assistance, the Arabs received the native officers with " honours," marched out at once, and gave up all the large dependencies they had held in mortgage from the Nizam's Government without any demur. Owsa was the last, indeed the only place, that caused me any anxiety ; and I knew that the Resident had also been very anxious about it, owing to its reputed great strength and the large number of its garrison. In Owsa, Purraindah, and Nuldroog, I now held the three strongest forts of the Deccan ; yet all had submitted without using any violence, and no further display of force than I have mentioned.

So ended my preliminary operations in my new province ; and I was about to leave Nuldroog, in order to start on a tour through the district, when I received a note from the Collector at Sholapoor asking me to come to him and arrange many matters pending between us. The prospect of a little holiday and society was very pleasant, and I went. His wife was an excellent musician—both sang delightfully ; and it was a great treat to me to hear once more the music of great composers skilfully executed, and to try my own voice in concerted pieces—a pleasure to which I had for so long been a stranger. They were very kind and very patient with me ; but I fear I gave the ladies some trouble, I had grown so rusty.

Owing to my very unsettled life latterly, my letters to the 'Times' had become irregular, and I could not keep up the necessary communications for news which were required for fortnightly letters.

There were no posts through my district; and letters and newspapers would, of necessity, reach me very irregularly, while the same objection applied to my despatch of letters. I reflected, also, that whereas hitherto my position at Shorapoor had left me comparatively independent, I was not so in my new appointment, and that I was not justified in writing so unrestrainedly on political subjects as I had been used to do. I therefore resigned my office of "special correspondent" to the great paper, which, from first to last, had uniformly treated my opinions and contributions with the greatest courtesy.

I could not, either, agree with the now confirmed annexation policy of Lord Dalhousie, which began in 1853, and seemed likely to be continued; and I knew that among the people generally the annexations of Jhansi and Nagpore, and the transactions in regard to the latter especially, were spoken of with unmeasured mistrust and suspicion. The proceedings in the Bombay Presidency in regard to the inquiry into free lands, charitable grants, and the like, had been, or was being, badly conducted, and had excited much discontent. My very outspoken

Mahrattas took no pains to conceal their censure of the conduct of Government as evincing a spirit of greed and bad faith which was strange and painful to many of them, and in these views people and gentry alike coincided.

During my period of connection with the 'Times,' however, I had enjoyed the privilege of discussing and explaining, as far as possible, all the great subjects which pertained to the period: education and its results on the people—for vernacular education had long since become a declared policy—trade, railways and communication of all kinds, cotton cultivation, irrigation in all its forms, along with the general political events of the previous ten years, momentous as they had been. I do not know whether these humble efforts of mine had any effect in bringing India and its people, its interests, and its increase of civilisation, more directly under the notice of thinking people in England. I hope so; and I was vain enough to think they might have some such effect, as they were generally backed up by leading articles in the paper itself, and thus attained some importance.

Now, there were other correspondents in the field, newspaper articles were better written, and their number had increased largely, so that the exponents of India's condition and wants were manifold, and there was no use in my continuing to send communications which must necessarily be unconnected and desultory. My correspondence all these years with my faithful friend Reeve never slackened, and his letters were a great source of pleasure and encouragement to me in my work, and kept me informed of what was going on in the political and literary circles in London, so that I did not feel quite so much my exclusion from them.

On my return from my pleasant little stay at Sholapoor, I went out to my tents, which were pitched at Tooljapoor, my old favourite resort in 1825. How beautiful it was! The hills were all clothed with verdure, and the view from my tent was lovely. On the north side of the promontory where I was, lay the town, built on both sides of a deep ravine, and at its head the celebrated shrine of Bhowanee or Kalee, which lay in the hollow beneath—not indeed, in itself, a remarkable edifice at all, but surrounded by picturesque cloisters and courts, always thronged by pilgrims, and which formed a curious combination of all kinds of Hindoo architecture.

Above the temple towered rugged cliffs on either side, and the ravine opened out into a large amphitheatre, bounded by precipitous hills, that seemed like buttresses to the plateau above. To the south was a great undulating plain, stretching to the dim blue horizon, dotted by thriving villages, surrounded by luxuriant cultivation, and checkered by ever-varying masses of light and shade. The line of the hills and plateau extending towards the east or Nuldroog direction, was broken by headlands and ravines descending to the lower country. There was no wood, it is true; but the diversified outlines, now rugged, and again more regular, redeemed the landscape from any monotony.

The climate was delightful, like that of an English summer day, in turn cloudy and sunshiny, with occasional light showers. On the day of my arrival, I had just breakfasted, and sat down to begin work in my cucherry, or office tent, when an old Brahmin came in, and for a time sat down quietly in a corner without speaking. Seeing that I was alone, he came up to my table, and peering closely into my face as he leant upon his staff, he said, "Are you the Taylor Sahib who came here many years ago?"

When I answered that I was the same, he produced a bundle of old papers, and asked me whether I recollected them. As I looked over them, I saw that I had put my initials to each of them, but forgot at the moment why I had done so; for in any case of inquiry or settlement it was my habit to initial all the papers, and I thought these documents must relate to some old claim or suit to be revised. I was soon undeceived.

"Have you forgotten, sahib," said the old man, "that I once cast your horoscope, and told you that you would return here to govern us after many years? And see! it was true!—you have come; and, indeed, there is little difference in the time I recorded—twenty-five years! I had not the exact data, if you remember, that I wanted—you could not give it to me."

It was all true enough; there I was, the "ruler" over them, and I then recollected how strange it had appeared to me at the Residency when my destination was so suddenly altered from Berar to these western districts, on the requisition of the Government of Bombay. The prediction had certainly been a strange one, and was as strangely fulfilled, even to the very letter of time.

"And you have been a 'rajah,' too," continued my old friend, "and have governed a country to the south for ten years; that I recorded—see, sahib!" and he pointed excitedly to the document. "See, there is no mistake there either!"

"Not quite a 'rajah,'" I said, laughing, "only manager of the country while the rajah was a child."

"It was all the same," returned the old Brahmin; "you were all-powerful, and just like a rajah, and you governed the people. And you have seen sorrow too, sahib; you were not married when you were here, and now you have lost wife and dear children, I hear? I wrote that. I saw it all plainly—it is here. And you are not rich, they tell me? Yet lakhs of rupees have passed through your hands. Did I not tell you that too?"

"No, indeed," I replied, "I am not rich; indeed much the reverse, and I have had heavy sorrows."

"It could not be avoided," he said; "no one could have mistaken what I discovered just twenty-five years ago. You were born for work, not for the indulgence of wealthy idleness, and so you will continue. If you want these papers I will give them to you; if not, let them remain with me," and so saying, he took his leave. He soon afterwards went on a pilgrimage to Nassik, and there died.

I did not want the papers, and he kept them. I cannot account for his prediction. I only relate what happened. I told my old Serishtadar, Baba Sahib, about my horoscope and its results; but he was not in the least surprised.

"We Brahmins," he said, "believe in astrology, and you English laugh at it; but when one who understands the art casts a horoscope and calculates it scientifically, the result is seldom wrong. You were to have gone to Berar, and yet your fate has brought you here to Tooljapoor again, at the very time appointed, twenty-five years after, in spite of yourself and also of the Resident. Can you doubt, after this? Is there not more in astrology than you believed?"

I made no comment. How could I, in the face of the simple facts that had occurred?

It was the rainy season, but there was so much to see after that could only be done on the spot in each division of my district, that my personal convenience must not be studied in any way; and I marched along the edge of the plateau from one division to another, halting at the head station of each for the purpose of investigating old accounts, records of cultivation and the like, and, above all, gaining, as I went, knowledge of the people.

A settlement of the country for five years had been directed, and inquiries were necessary before any attempt could be made to carry out the measure. I did not even know what the revenue of the whole district might amount to ; and the accounts received from Hyderabad, if not actually designed to mislead, were at all events most incorrect and incomprehensible, proving to be of no use whatever. I therefore began at the foundation—the village accounts—and was glad to see that they had been far better kept than those of Shorapoor, when I began a like inquiry there. The village accountant had proper lists of proprietors and occupants of land, according to the ancient Deccan system, which had never been altered, however much it might have been abused ; and among the records of some of the chief towns and villages, were ancient settlements of the officers of the Bahmany kings of Gulburgah and Beeder, and the Adil Shahys of Beejapoor. The most regular and valuable records were the settlements by Mullik UMBER, the great regent of the Ahmednugger State, which were more minute than those of the Emperor Akbar, and were founded upon an actual survey of the lands and their assessment, according to their productive quality. But these had only been preserved here and there, and it would be impossible to found any new settlement upon those that existed as a basis for all. The Nizam's Government had taken no record of cultivation; but the sums received from villages were entered in an account for every talook, or division, which was signed by the hereditary ministerial officers of each county, and which, up to the last financial year, had been regularly sent up to the head accountant's office at Hyderabad. From these documents, compared with the village accounts and registries, I could see my way to a new form of account which would embrace all particulars; and copies of these forms were made by the village accountants, to be filled up when the yearly period of settlement arrived.

It was very tedious work; but unless it were done, it would be impossible to submit to Government any clear or complete statement of the general revenue, or whence it was derived. My progress was necessarily very slow.

In the original instructions given to the Deputy-Commissioners, they had been directed to make use of the existing local courts of the Nizam's Government for the trial of all cases, civil and criminal: but as no local tribunal or judicial office of any kind was found by me, and none had existed for years, I determined to introduce a code of laws of my own, civil as well as criminal; and I took the regulations of Bombay as my guide, drawing up a short definition of crimes and their punishments—and in civil cases, of general procedure,—simple and intelligible to all classes. I assigned various powers to patelis, or heads of villages, to talook officers, to my assistant, and to myself—mine being the highest court of appeal in the province from the decisions of subordinate courts, and the Resident being the final one to whom all appeals against me were to be referred.

This code and general plan of mine were approved of as a temporary measure at Calcutta, and I put it in force as soon as it was sanctioned. It lasted till Macaulay's penal code was sent for a practical trial in the assigned districts, but the civil procedure I had drawn up was, I think, retained. These, with instructions for the guidance of police, revenue proceedings and collections, and for the conduct of every department, occupied a great deal of my time; but all were as brief and concise as possible, though necessarily embracing every point for general direction.

After Colonel Low's departure from the post of Resident at Hyderabad, several distinguished officers were named as his probable successors.

Sir Henry Lawrence, to whom I believe Lord Dalhousie offered the appointment, and my old friend James Outram, whom I would have gladly welcomed, were among those talked of; but as the office of Resident now involved the head administration of the assigned districts, and as everything in regard to them was still in an incomplete state, a civilian of administrative experience was held to be the fittest person; and Mr Bushby, once an assistant to the Resident at Hyderabad, was appointed to the office, which, until his arrival, was conducted with much ability by (then) Captain Davidson.

It was his wish, as it had been that of Colonel Low, that my district should have a well-defined frontier; and all the boundaries, except those to the north, had been gradually adjusted. I had even been exempted from the vexatious task of administering justice and police affairs in the reserved portions which lay along the Bhema to the south-west, and they remained under the charge of their native proprietors. But to the north, on the borders of the Ahmednugger and Nizam's territory, there remained a small tract, hitherto undefined, and often much disturbed, the British and Nizam's villages lying confusedly together.

This was by far the prettiest and most picturesque portion of my province. The plateau of the "Bálá Ghât" continued to the hills forming the Ahmednugger range; but at one point it lowered considerably, breaking into ravines, which ran south towards the Secnab, and north-east to the Godavery, a very rough tract, with a corresponding rough class of inhabitants, who required to be kept well under control.

While encamped at Patoda, the station of my native collector, I explored the whole of the crest of the plateau towards the north-west, and found the scenery very beautiful. There was no jungle, but the grassy hills afforded fine pasturage for cattle, and the views from the summits of the highest knolls were, in some instances, very grand.

In one place a small river, the Incherna, which received the drainage of a great portion of these hills, fell into the lower level of the western portion of my district with one leap of 398 feet, sheer perpendicular fall, and now, being well filled with water, formed one of the most graceful waterfalls I have ever seen. I did not expect to come upon anything so grand or picturesque as this fall and the basalt chasm into which it precipitated itself, and I was lost in admiration, re-maintaining at the place for several days, in order to sketch the ravine and waterfall from every point of view. I have described it fully in my novel of 'Seeta,' to which I refer any curious reader who may wish to know more.

I descended by a well-known pass to the low country north of my district, and found, as I had anticipated from a copy of the trigonometrical survey map, exactly the frontier I desired. A considerable stream flowed from the west, almost in a direct line eastwards. Its name was the Suitana; while a smaller one, the Domeri, rising on the plateau, flowed due north, and fell into it. Within this line were sixteen scattered villages of the Nizam's mingled with British villages and my own; and after representing the difficulty of maintaining all three jurisdictions in a state of amity, they were transferred entirely to me, under the orders of the Nizam's Government. The whole tract had been in a state of chronic feud for years, and the correspondence and other references, regarding all manner of disputes, had been vexatious and endless. I found no less than seventy boundary disputes had to be adjusted, of which I settled the worst, leaving the tract for the final supervision of my assistant, who now joined me. I determined to proceed to Ahmednugger, in order to confer with Mr Bell, the Collector there, as I had already done with Mr Loughman, the Collector of Sholapoor, upon all matters which required settlement.

Cadell had had a little adventure at Purraindah, by far the strongest fort in the district, situated in his division. He had not been able to visit it personally before, and when he arrived the garrison shut to the gates, mounted the bastions, and declared they would not give it up. He might do what he liked with the dependencies, but they were the garrison, and they declared that until they received orders from Hyderabad, they would not open the gates. Finding remonstrance useless, Cadell wrote to me for help, in the shape of a troop of cavalry, with which he could watch the place to see that no malcontents got in to help the garrison. I wrote to the killadar, or castellan, desiring him to evacuate the fort, to which he demurred; and I then wrote again, saying he must do so, or fight, for that no orders could come now from Hyderabad, the country having been entirely ceded to the British Government. The troop of cavalry arriving almost immediately after my letter reached him, the killadar saw that I was in earnest, and thought "discretion the better part of valour ;"

so he opened the gates, and as Cadell marched in and took possession, the garrison laid down their arms, which he at once returned to them. He described the place as the strongest he had seen, and quite perfect in every way, and there was a very respectable garrison of Rajpoots. I was glad on every account that the affair had been tidied over so peaceably. I visited Purraindah myself afterwards, and shall describe it later.

Having made all the arrangements I could in the newly-acquired territory of Manoor, I went on to Ahmednugger. One of my villages lay within nine miles of the station, and, owing to its beauty, was a favourite resort for country parties and picnics. I met Mr Bell there, and he hospitably invited both Cadell and myself to his house, where we spent some days very pleasantly at the great station. I had not been there since the year 1826, and found it greatly improved and enlarged.

In my journey both to and from Ahmednugger, I had been much struck with the capabilities of the country for large irrigation works, and in particular for tanks. Streams, descending from the table-lands to the north, and tributaries to the Secnah, afforded ample supplies of water; and the ground, from its peculiar character, provided most convenient basins, which only required dams at certain places across their mouths to be converted into tanks.

In one instance a stream which had a catchment area of upwards of 200 square miles, after leaving the hills, ran through a nearly level plain of about four square miles in area, which ended in two bluffs about a quarter of a mile asunder. A dam of fifty feet high was perfectly practicable at a comparatively small outlay, and the water held back would form a lake twice the size of Bohnal. I determined, with as little delay as possible, to get up a report on the subject, and try to have some works of the kind begun for a country which was absolutely thirsting for water, and where every drop that could be procured from wells or from streams was used for the production of sugar-cane, ginger, turmeric, and other rich and valuable crops.

Mr Bell met us at a village which we had agreed upon, where there was good camping-ground, and which, though under his charge, was within our frontier, and there we passed some days in November very agreeably. As he had brought his establishment with him, we compared our work, and he was not a little surprised, I think, to find mine quite as regular in all respects as his own, except in the revenue department, the particulars of which we had still to unravel, whereas his had been decided by survey. I was now settling three divisions in order to enable my assistant to work for himself; and when these were completed, I left him, to look after my eastern districts on the table-land, which I had not yet visited.

By the end of the year 1853 the whole was in fair working order, and giving me no anxiety, except as to the scarcity which seemed to threaten us owing to failure of crops. There had been no rain since September, and comparatively little before that. Portions of the Bombay Presidency were already suffering, and Shorapoor was also in distress. The accounts from thence were very sad. Neglect, riot, and crime prevailed; and I was indeed grateful that, although I was worse paid as a Deputy-Commissioner than I should have been as Political Agent there, yet I was spared the pain of seeing all the fair structure I had striven so long and so hard to raise rapidly falling into ruin and decay.

All we Deputy-Commissioners had been placed on a salary of 1200 rupees a-month, as a temporary rate of payment, and, as yet, we received no "deputation" allowance, but were promised it, to provide for the expenses of tents and moving about our districts.

When the local officers were pensioned, we hoped that we, who had now become servants of the Company, might be granted our Nizam's pensions apart from our pay, as was at first arranged; but ultimately this was not allowed—both were included in the pay of a Deputy-Commissioner, a proceeding which I have always considered unjust, for we were not serving the Nizam but the Company; and if the Government of India had set us aside and sent its own officers, it would have had to pay both charges out of the revenue of the cession. When we were transferred to the new service, our rank was recognised in all respects as those of "Company's officers" of corresponding length of service; but in this respect also were we painfully deceived—we were placed in the category of "Uncovenanted servants," by which we lost all our former rank and privileges, and were reduced in status. One of our number laid down his rank, and would never resume it. However, hard as it was, we were grateful for employment at all, though I have never ceased to consider it an ungenerous act of the great Government of India, to take advantage, as it seemed, of our necessities, and to give us lower pay than it gave to its own servants in like employment, and in charge of far smaller districts and with less responsibilities than ours.

I will state the question clearly in figures. My pension from the Nizam's Government was 300 rupees a-month, or £360 a-year; my pay 1200 rupees a-month.

Had I received 1200 rupees a-month and my pension as well, my receipts would have been 1500 rupees a-month. Now I was to receive in all 1200 rupees—that is, 900 rupees pay and 300 rupees pension; so the 300 rupees were saved, which we considered taking rather a mean advantage of us. We were no more Nizam's servants, but had been taken over into the Company's service, and, as such, should have received salaries on the same scale as those already in their employ.

By the close of the year I had already made considerable progress in the suppression of the terrible normal crime of dacoity. Several old dacoits had turned approvers, and had given details of robberies and murders, which had been shockingly numerous. Through them stolen property was traced, and recovered too, to a very large amount; and out of one dacoit's house at Owsa, articles of various kinds, to the value of 1200 rupees, were taken, which had been his share of the plunder secured on that occasion. I was blamed at first by the Resident for raking up old cases; but I held my ground, for those I had tried were all comparatively recent, though the crimes had been committed before the cession. I was determined to eradicate the pest if I could, and I thought the only chance lay in attacking the old gangs and in bringing their crimes home to them. This had been done in Thuggee, why not in Dacoity? The question was referred to Calcutta, and soon decided as regarded the assigned districts. All criminal offences, such as dacoity and murder, were deemed open to trial within a period of ten years from the date of their perpetration; and according to this rule I was at liberty to work, and I did so vigorously. Already I had achieved something, and more would follow.

By Lord Dalhousie's request I kept up my correspondence with Mr Courtenay; I think his lordship liked to know unofficially what I was about, and I wrote free and unreservedly. A report I had sent in upon my system of administration had interested him a good deal, and I heard he took it away to study in private, and that he desired I might be told this. He had also entirely acquiesced in my plan of revenue settlement to precede a survey ; and to hear that what I had done was approved of, was very cheering.

I found the eastern portion of my district in a far worse condition than the western, and I find myself writing thus to my father in March 1854 :

“ While at Nelingah I was more oppressed with work than I had been anywhere. I found the district in shocking order : no proper accounts, and no confidence among the people ; a ruined, impoverished set of pauper cultivators, who have been so long oppressed and neglected under the Arab management, that they are, I imagine, blunted to all good perceptions. Murder, robbery, attacks on villages, plunder of cattle, and destruction of crops, had got to such a height last year, that civil war could not have had a worse effect upon the people or on the revenue ; and all agreed that if British rule had not come in this year, the whole district would have been utterly ruined and wasted. I never saw anything like it. I thought Shorapoor bad, but this is infinitely worse, and the labour it is to get anything put right has been excessive. I can only say that I have been obliged to work frequently from 4 A.M. to 8 P.M., with only respite for dressing and breakfast ; but there is no help for it. I have been giving five years' settlements to such villages as are ready to take them, but there are many which are so disorganised that they require to be specially nursed."

I had likewise introduced a regular system of village accounts with the rent-payers and the treasurers, which I will briefly detail.

Each village accountant kept a day-book and ledger, in which the sum he was to pay was entered to his debit, and his payments successively at stated times to his credit. His account was entered in the village ledger in the same manner. If he paid an instalment, it was entered to his credit in his book as a receipt ; and this payment was entered into the day-book, and afterwards posted to his account in the ledger. Peculation was therefore almost impossible, or any undue exactions, and the people now began to understand the protection that the system implied. The district treasury had a similar account with villages, and the particulars of each village instalment were forwarded to the head treasury with the general remittances. Any error or any exaction by any individual could thus be traced up to its author at once, and the check and counter-check were quite efficient in practice. The village accountants were at first rather clumsy about their books, but they soon grew accustomed to the system; and before the season of collections was over, I had the satisfaction of finding that the plan was working easily and well in every portion of my province.

Before I returned to my headquarters, Nuldroog, I had the satisfaction of beginning two new irrigation reservoirs near Tooljapoor, on plans and surveys which I had previously submitted. I intended that these should form the commencement of a system of tank-irrigation from Tooljapoor to Ahmednugger, a question in which the Governor-General seemed much interested, and in which he encouraged me heartily to persevere.

The Resident also, Mr Bushby, began to see the necessity of it; and I was the more rejoiced at obtaining sanction for this, because great distress was prevalent, though it scarcely amounted to famine yet, and three new works would enable me to employ a great number of persons. I was glad, too, to find that both my neighbours, the collectors of Ahmednugger and Sholapoor, had become strong advocates for irrigation-works, and had sent in urgent representations to Government on the subject. In these undertakings I had to make the surveys, plans, and calculations entirely myself; but I always managed to find time to do these before my daily work began, so that other business was never interfered with or postponed. It seemed strange to me that though irrigation-works were progressing in the North-West Provinces with great energy, in the Bombay Presidency no one seemed to take the least interest in them, and, had it not been for these gentlemen, would probably ever have given a thought to the subject; and indeed, to this day, I believe but little progress has been made in these most useful works.

I had great difficulties to encounter in the treasury department for the first year or two. Rents had been paid in all sorts of local currencies, and I was required to account for them in Company's rupees. Now I had as many as fourteen different kinds of rupees current in my province, each with its separate value, and the market value was often fluctuating; the assay rates did not correspond at all with the market value, and, in short, the whole was a system of inextricable confusion; and I was obliged in the end to notify that none except Company's rupees would be taken in payments to the State, and this relieved us of all difficulty.

For a long time the proposed revenue survey caused much trouble and vexation. A small manual had been sent us from the Punjaub of the system in use there, which was by plane-tables,—and plane-tables were sent afterwards. Every Deputy-Commissioner was to have a school of instruction, and to teach the putwarries, or village accountants, to survey their own lands; and the work was to begin at once. This was all easy enough to write about; but the carrying such orders into effect was a very different matter. I believe I happened to be the only Deputy-Commissioner who knew how to survey, and the rest looked to me to begin operations.

Extensive correspondence on the subject took place, and cost me much additional time and trouble; but I could not use the Punjaub instruments and the compasses with which the work was to be done—it was impossible; and after much writing and loss of time in useless endeavours at explanation, I introduced a plan of my own. I had some better plane-tables made, and worked them by backsight, like a theodolite, and my plan succeeded very well. I also established a school of young men, instead of the putwarries, who proved apt scholars, and did good work, and I sent in my report with some specimens of surveyed lands. My plan was approved, and I was simply desired "to go on."

I found distress very great at Nuldroog—not so much among the people of my own district, as among starving wretches who came there from all quarters so emaciated, and so shrivelled and weak, that all, men, women, and children, were fearful to look upon. Often, during my morning rides, I came upon dead bodies lying by the roadside, creatures who had sunk down to die before they could reach the town; and many crawled in who were too far gone to be recovered. Except at Hingolee I had never seen famine in its worst form before, and this was horrible to witness. I did what I could myself, and every one at Nuldroog did the same: my own share amounted to several thousand rupees, which I could very ill afford; and it was not for a comparatively long time that I could get any answer to my earnest request to be allowed to use what money I needed, to give employment to those able to work. At length, however, I got a favourable reply, and about four thousand miserable wretches were set to work to cut down the scrubby jungle in the fort, and to clear out the old ruined works. Gradually, as rain fell and prospects brightened, the people began to return to their various homes.

What would have become of us at Nuldroog if the famine had been universal, I can hardly conceive; for its results from which we suffered were fearful enough.

The monsoon was heavy, and all the month of September proved very unhealthy at Nuldroog. My establishment, and nearly all the clerks, both English and native, suffered from fever, dysentery, and other complaints; so that to get through the needful work was very trying. We had no other convenient shelter, and so were obliged to remain; but I thought it doubtful whether the place could be retained as a head-station. However, a further trial of it was directed before it was given up.

The year 1854 had been a truly laborious one to me, and except during the very short period of the late rains, I had been under canvas since July 1853. The work accomplished had been enormous. In English, Persian, and Mahratta, the references and letters had been 34,474, upwards of 9000 of which had passed between my assistant and myself, many being on very intricate and tedious subjects. We corresponded officially always in Mahratta.

For my own share I had had 272 criminal cases to dispose of, thirteen of which were indictments for murder : of civil cases and appeals I find no record among my letters, but no doubt they may have been mislaid or lost.

My revenue for the financial year was all collected — except about 3000 rupees, which still had to be remitted—and amounted to 10 lakhs and 66,000 rupees of all sorts ; which, allowing for large deductions, exchanges, &c., became Rs. 886,565 13 3.

The revenue for the previous year had been, according to the local accounts, Rs. 699,305 11 8, so that there had been an increase of Rs. 187,260 1 7. The amount of land previously under cultivation had been 1,192,395 beegahs ; that for the present year 1,221,947 beegahs, or an increase of 29,552.

Further particulars are unnecessary, and would scarcely interest the general reader.

In spite of a little fever, from which I suffered at Nuldroog, I was in rude health. I enjoyed the climate of the district, and along the edge of the table-land it was generally cool in the hottest weather.

I was always able to work at least twelve hours every day, and often more, except on Sundays, when I always read the service in my tents to my English clerks.

Every department of the district was now in fair working order, and I was quite prepared to show the Resident, if he came to see it, as it was hinted he would, all my interior economy, and wished it to be compared with other districts of the same class.

I was directed by the Resident to meet the Collector of Sholapoor on the frontier, in order to settle a boundary dispute which had arisen between the Rajah of Akulkote's territory and the Nizam's, and in regard to which there had been some serious fighting and bloodshed ; so I made for the spot early in November, expecting that everything would be satisfactorily arranged in a few days.

It proved, however, that I had to survey 26 miles of disputed boundary, and to make a map of it, before the question could even be understood at all ; documents on both sides had to be examined, and evidence taken. Finally, after recording our opinion in separate minutes, part of the boundary was laid down ; but the Akulkote men came in the night, pulled up the stones which had been placed as landmarks and threw them away.

As I could wait no longer, and the Collector had no authority to enforce our decision, I left the place on the 18th December, heartily regretting that my detention had been so long and so unprofitable; and I moved to a village on the eastern frontier to begin the revenue settlement for the year. I should then be close to the Resident's line of march from Hyderabad to Nuldroog, and could easily join him at the nearest point.

I was glad to find the people on the eastern and western frontiers taking heart; and I had the pleasure of letting nearly all the uncultivated lands, which had become covered with low mimosa jungle. There was a better spirit abroad in the country, and the local bankers were ready to make advances for the cultivation of these waste lands on low rates of interest to any extent. The fact was, that agents from some of the great mercantile houses in Bombay had acted upon a circular which I had sent them some months before, pointing out to them the capabilities of my province for the production of oil-seeds and other staple commodities of trade; and they had sent agents with bills of exchange to a very large amount to invest in these purchases. One of these agents had bills to the extent of three lakhs (£30,000); and in all I traced more than £60,000, which was a very welcome addition to former capital. No such influx of money had ever been known before, and I recommended the agents to deal directly with the farmers, without the intervention of any third party; and they took my advice, and ultimately all were quite satisfied.

The Resident and his staff left Hyderabad on the 20th December, and I met him at Kullianee, in the Nizam's territory, on the 1st January 1855. He received me very kindly. As I rode into camp, he was just starting on his elephant, and he asked me to come with him, which I did, and we were soon deep in friendly talk about all sorts of things. We travelled together to Nuldroog, where I had plenty to show him—all the treasury books and accounts, the jail, &c., &c.; and I had collected the putwarries of a number of villages and their books, and explained my system to him. He was pleased to say "he could hardly believe that so perfect a system could have been organised;" and he was more and more satisfied as we proceeded further, and the books of other groups of villages were shown to him. He did not like Nuldroog at all, and said there must be another head-station—and in this view I quite coincided; but there could be no change made for the present.

I was very anxious to lay my projects for irrigation-works before him, and he marched with me to Tooljapoor, where the largest tank had been marked out, and this seemed to decide him in regard to the more extended system which I had advocated. He said he was very anxious to show that the "assigned districts could do as much for their size as the Punjaub," and promised to send on to Government all the plans and estimates that could be prepared.

He could propose no change in judicial matters, as my small code was working very satisfactorily; and he confided to me that I was the only Deputy-Commissioner who had attempted to introduce anything of the kind.

The Resident had not very much time to spare; we therefore went on from Tooljapoor to Owsa, but I regretted his being unable to see the prettiest part of the district, which lay along the edge of the table-land.

He was immensely struck, however, with the regularity and beauty of the fine old fort of Owsa; and indeed, if the Arabs who formed the garrison when I first took possession of it had chosen to resist, the place could only have been taken by a regular siege. I left the Resident at Bhalkee, a point on the Hyderabad road; and we had, when we parted, settled everything as far as we could. I showed him the survey work, which pleased him. No other Deputy - Commissioner had as yet even attempted a commencement, and it gratified him that I had done so, in spite of my refusal to make use of the Punjaub system. We parted very good friends ; and as I fancied, on his first coming, that he had acquired rather a prejudice against me, I was the more pleased at the result of our meeting. I knew my district was in a much more orderly and regular condition than any other ceded at the same time, and I was anxious it should be inspected.

At the request of the people, I chose the site of a new market-town near Nelingah. There were more than a hundred applications for sites, so I designed a market-place and a hall of assembly ; and the Resident having given his sanction, we began to build at once. Nelingah was now a place of trade and a resort of merchants, yet how it was reduced ! The old accounts showed its revenue to have been 12,000 rupees a-year ; now it did not reach above 3000.

After much tedious and lengthy correspondence respecting the difference in value of currencies collected during the first year, which I had cut short by accepting only Company's rupees in payments during the present year, I was able to submit my accounts of revenue and collections at an early period; and the following copy of a memorandum I sent to my father in July will show what progress had been made :—

“ Cultivation.—Contrasting the returns of 1852-53 with those of 1854-55, and after adjustment of all transfers of villages attached to proprietors, lands released, &c., there is a clear increase of new cultivation of beegahs 139,190. A beegah, by the average of local measurement, is here upwards of an acre—about 1.30.

“ Revenue.—The gross and net revenue of 1851-52, including all estates resumed by us, customs duties, &c., was :—

Gross revenue, Hyderabad rupees, . . . . .	856,263	7	5
Village expenses, . . . . .	164,882	13	5
Balance, net revenue, Hyderabad rupees, . . . . .	691,380	10	0
Gross revenue for 1854-55 in Company's rupees, . . . . .	922,666	8	0
Deduct village expenses, . . . . .	97,993	8	9
Balance, net revenue, in Company's rupees, . . . . .	824,672	15	3

Net revenue, 1854-55, Company's rupees, . . . . .	824,672	15	3
Net revenue, 1851-52, Hyderabad rupees, . . . . .	691,380	10	0
Increase in tale, . . . . .	Rs. 133,292	5	3

“ The value of the different rupees is not here given ; and either the Hyderabad rupees may be turned into Company's at 21 per cent, or the Company's into Hyderabad, and here is the result :—

Company's rupees, 824,672, at 121 for 100
Hyderabad rupees, . . . . .	997,853 1 11
Net revenue of 1851-52, as above, . . . . .	691,380 10 0
Net increase, value, Hyderabad rupees,	306,472 7 11

Or, if the Nizam's Government's share only of 1851-52 for the whole province is reckoned, the amount will stand as follows :—

Net revenue of 1854-55, as above, Company's rupees, 824,672, at 121 per 100, =	997,853 1 11
Realised by the Nizam's Government in 1851-52, according to account, . . . . .	562,457 14 9
Given to the Nizam's Government by cession on the result of 1854-55, in
Hyderabad rupees, . . . . .	435,395 3 2

“ Even this is not all, for the Rs. 562,457 14 9 contained the customs duties abolished in 1854-55. These amounted to Rs. 35,000 ; and there is a further profit in decrease of village charges, which were 19.41 per cent on the gross revenue in 1851-52—and in 1854-55, 10.84 per cent.

“ The average rate of assessment per beegah, or acre, is nine annas and two pies (about one shilling and three halfpence); and there is no other tax or cess whatever.

“In reference to the gross revenue of 1854-55, the total remission from unrealised balances is Rs. 620 5 6 : or 922,666 8 Company's rupees have been realised, all but Rs. 620 5 6 ; or £92,266, all except £62.”

There remained, therefore, no doubt whatever that the cession of this province had been highly profitable to the Nizam's Government. The actual receipts had very nearly doubled, and the revenue was secured in Company's rupees instead of in fluctuating currencies. The local profits of the Nizam's talookdars, or collectors, had been enormous. They had collected all the revenue, for the most part, in a local currency, which was little short in value in the market of the Company's rupee ; but instead of giving their Government the benefit of the exchange into Hyderabad rupees, they had paid Hyderabad rupees only by bills on Hyderabad, which were cashed in the local debased currency of the city itself.

If this were a specimen of one province, what must have been the result from them all ? Berar, like Nuldroog, showed a similar difference of value and increase in favour of the cession.

In August of this year the distress seemed almost greater than the year before. There had been no rain since June, and the poorer classes, who were accustomed to gain their living by weeding fields and other agricultural work, were now starving, and flocking in crowds to Nuldroog. We all did what we could, as we had done the year before, and it was a heavy drain on private individuals. I urged the Resident to allow me to begin the roads to Sholapoor and Hyderabad, which he had promised, and which would have greatly relieved the local strain upon me and others, but I had to wait a weary time for an answer.

During this month, too, I lost the valuable services of my assistant Cadell. He had gone to Hyderabad on leave for a month, and when there, Bullock, who was Commissioner in Berar, applied for furlough to England on medical certificate; the Raichore Commissioner was ordered to act in Berar, and Cadell was sent to Raichore. I was very sorry to lose my friend. He had managed four out of my ten divisions admirably from the first; he was always kind, courteous, and considerate to natives of every degree, and had won golden opinions from all. We had worked well together, and he was thoroughly acquainted with his duties in every respect.

Personally, I was very much attached to him, and shall never forget, while I live, our pleasant days together.

No assistant was appointed in his stead, and the whole work of the province fell upon me, without any additional pay; but I was grateful for excellent health, though I hardly hoped it would long hold out under the terrible strain now put upon me.

We had no rain till September; but the new roads, to the commencement of which a tardy sanction had at length been given, provided labour for upwards of 4000 men, women, and children, and saved them from starvation. I also cleared out the fort altogether, and thus employed 1500 more persons: every old wall was levelled, and the stones were thrown into hollows and covered with earth. In October heavy rain fell all over the district, and we thanked God that all dread of famine was at an end. The very early crops had withered, but now every acre of land was being re-ploughed and sown, and the prospects were very cheering. Another road to Tooljapoor was sanctioned, and put in hand; and I had completed thirty miles of one and fifteen of another, having been obliged to do all the surveying and laying out myself. They were only cleared and levelled to begin with, and would be metalled afterwards.

My brother-in-law, William Palmer, was at last appointed as my assistant. He had served in a similar capacity in North and South Berar. In the latter province no system whatever had been introduced, neither revenue, account, nor judicial, and the Resident had gone there on a tour of inspection. Cadell, too, wrote from Raichore to say that he had everything to originate there, and he did not like it at all ; but I hoped he was in a fair way for promotion. The work at the large tank at Tooljapoor had been stopped, pending formal sanction by Government—but this had been granted ; and after testing all my old levelling by a new instrument which my father sent to me from England, the embankment was begun in earnest. In December all looked well—crops were luxuriant, work progressing, and people happy and contented ; and for this peaceful close to a very trying year, I felt most grateful. I again received orders to meet the Resident on his return from South Berar to Hyderabad, at any point nearest to my boundary. I therefore, while waiting for him, carried on the survey of the road from Tooljapoor to Kullianee, and contrived to get through from seven to nine miles per day, laying down marks for the contractors and workmen. I finally met the Resident at his camp at Bundapoor on the 14th January 1856. He was exceedingly kind and friendly towards me. He expressed himself dissatisfied with the condition of South Berar, and was pleased to say many flattering things about the order and regularity in all departments which he had found at Nuldroog. As still further improvement had continued since his visit, I would have liked to have taken him through part of my district; but time did not permit of it, and he could not delay longer his return to Hyderabad. There was no difference of opinion between us except in regard to the survey, as to which I consistently maintained my first position, that unless it had a scientific basis, and the surveyors had a practical education and knowledge of their work, they could not deal with village lands like those of Nuldroog, some of the areas of which were from 20,000 to 30,000 acres in extent; and that to persevere in the Punjaub scheme would not only entail loss of time, but of money also.

We had several hot arguments about this; but at last the Resident confided to me that the Punjaub work had been an utter failure when scientifically tested, and he showed me some of the correspondence, which was convincing.

I was therefore allowed now to work out my own tables in my own way. I had a number of clever pupils, who were ready to set to work at once, and I promised to show results in a very short time, which I hoped would be considered satisfactory. All official clouds and differences were dispersed, and we were of one accord in all matters. In private Mr Bushby was one of the pleasantest of companions; and we sat up each night into the small hours of the morning, engaged in pleasant talk, and schemes for the further improvement of my district. He had sent on all my plans for roads and irrigation-works; and estimates, exceeding a lakh of rupees, had been passed by Government. All this made me very hopeful.

I thought very earnestly at this time of taking furlough to England, and seeing my father once more, and of bringing out my children to India, if it were practicable. My heart yearned to see them and all the dear ones at home, yet there were many difficulties. I had no society, and no means of continuing their education; and Nuldroog, or life in tents, was quite unfit for them. I could not, either, go home on medical certificate, for, thank God! my health was first-rate; and no doctor in Bombay, seeing my ruddy cheeks and strong frame, would have ventured to give me one. So I had no alternative but to wait patiently the tide of events.

I was not without a hope, that as a head-commissioner was to be appointed to superintend the whole of the districts, I might be nominated to the post. This would have involved residence at Hyderabad, where I could have had home and friends for my children; but in this I was disappointed. Alas! I was not a regular Company's servant, only an outsider, "uncovenanted," and the Company's rules could not be infringed! Already, I heard from Mr Courtenay, there existed much jealousy in regard to the offices held by "local officers;" and much as Lord Dalhousie wished personally to serve me, he dared not provoke further dissatisfaction.

On the 6th March, Lord Dalhousie departed from Calcutta for England, leaving behind him a minute, which has its place in history, in which he detailed what he had done during his viceroyalty. His last annexation had been Oudh; but that had not been his own work. It had been for some time imminent, and was finally decided upon by the Court of Directors and the Government of England. It is only in future histories of India, and from his own papers, should they ever be published, that the character and acts of Lord Dalhousie as Governor-General can be properly estimated ; as yet, he has had his eulogists, and his bitter opponents, almost, indeed, amounting to defamers.

To my humble perception he was the most practically useful and single-minded ruler that India had ever possessed. His great mind took in every question with a singular clearness, whether it were large or small, momentous or unimportant, and he improved everything he touched. To him India owes electric telegraphs, railways, extension of practical education, large irrigation projects, roads, and the removal of many disabilities under which natives suffered. No one who ever worked under Lord Dalhousie could for a moment question his unerring detection of any weak point, and the great power of mind and application which distinguished him, and at no period of Indian history had the administration of India been so admirably conducted.

To receive a word of praise from him was the desire which lay nearest every heart ; and when given, it was never in a cold or niggardly spirit, but warmly and most encouragingly. To myself personally, though I knew him not, he had been, both privately and officially, kind and considerate from first to last; and I only regret that I cannot find among my papers the last expression of his lordship's sentiments towards me, in transmitting a copy of the last despatch of the Court of Directors in reference to the affairs of Shorapoor.

I have spoken of my own work, and have called it hard, lasting from twelve to sixteen hours daily; but this was made up of the petty details of one province. Lord Dalhousie did as much each day, with the direction of all India on his mind. "No one can record," wrote the 'Times,' "for few knew, of his daily toil, or how, with a delicate frame, he overcame it, but which overworked and destroyed his physical powers, and in 1860 sent him to his grave."

When he left her, India seemed secure and peaceful, and he retired with a very sincere conviction that so she would long remain!

I was desired in February to meet a native commissioner from Hyderabad, to settle the boundary of jurisdiction, which had been under dispute, and we were to act in concert. I waited wearily for a month, losing the best period of my season; and when at length the commissioner arrived, he had received no instructions, and further delay ensued. At length, after he had made references to his Government on various points, we arranged affairs amicably.

I was principally engaged in trying criminal cases, which were both numerous and heavy; but there were no dacoities now, and these cases belonged chiefly to the period before the cession. As a proof of what I had to do in judicial affairs, I may here mention that Mr Compton, who was judge of Sholapoor, sent me a memorandum of the result of his work within a certain period. He had tried 72 cases, whereas my file showed 172 for the same!

My police system was working well. Every patell, or head of a village, was made a local magistrate, with certain powers, and a small allowance; and as a mark of distinction, the post was much esteemed. It gratified me also to find that my rules for the police were ordered for adoption in every province of the cession.

My accounts were made out, and sent up to Hyderabad with the administration report in July. The increase of cultivation in three years had been 184,000 acres. In 1855-56, 72,000 acres of new land had been taken up, but 34,000 were abandoned in the famine, which would not have been the case had rain fallen, and we should have had, with that, 218,000 acres of increase. As the revenue augmented, petty taxes would be remitted, as I had arranged from the first. This year 40,000 rupees would be struck off, yet the whole revenue would not be seriously affected. I need not give again all the details, as those of the previous year will suffice.

In August Mr T. N. Maltby, of the Madras Civil Service, was appointed head-commissioner, and Mr Bushby was relieved from the extra duties which had been imposed upon him, and which were very onerous. We looked out now for changes and amendments, which would form part of a more regular system than we had yet experienced. It was very evident to our commissioner, in the first place, that without increased establishments, the demands for regular reports, constantly increasing, could not be complied with, nor could the strain on any one who could and would do the work be borne much longer. As some relief to me, my head ministerial officer, "Baba Sahib," a very shrewd and excellent revenue officer, whom I had brought with me from Shorapoor, was promoted to the rank of extra-assistant; and he, with my assistant Mr Palmer, relieved me of much of the petty detail which had distressed me before. Cadell had been appointed Deputy-Commissioner in South Berar, and Eastern Raichore had been added to the western portion as part of the new arrangements. He was now, I was glad to see, on the highroad to promotion, and he had truly well earned his advance. My work never slackened in amount; and in reply to my father's query as to how my day was spent, I wrote as follows: "Up at 5 A.M., and go out about the survey of the roads. In by eight o'clock and answer letters, English and Mahratta, till ten; bathe, and breakfast over at eleven. Then to cucherry work, trials, &c., till 6 P.M., without stirring—often, indeed, till seven. Dine, and sit an hour or so with Palmer, if he is there, or with some native friend, by way of a rest, which brings up the time to half-past eight or nine. Then to my room, and work at translations or other business till eleven or twelve. Count up all this and you will see there is no time for anything except hard work; yet, I am very thankful to say, I have neither pain nor ache."

The public works did not slacken either. Every road I had surveyed and marked out was in active progress, and there were now six long distances under the labourers' hands.

Our new Commissioner had written to me to say that he proposed taking my district the first in his projected tour of inspection. He was to leave Hyderabad on the 20th November; and as I had a little leisure time and needed rest, I went into Sholapoor on a visit to my kind friends, Mr and Mrs Compton. What a treat this was to me! She was a highly-accomplished and exquisite musician, and it was delightful to listen to her. I had heard so little music since I had been in England, and had nearly forgotten all I knew; but it came back to me, and I had the great delight of singing all my favourite duets, Italian and English; and they were so kind and sympathetic, these dear friends, that my heart warmed to them both, nor did our friendship ever lessen. My pleasant stay ended abruptly, as I had to return to Nuldroog sooner than I expected. Another assistant was added to my staff, Lieutenant Temple of the Madras Army, who, having passed an examination as civil engineer, and having been employed in the survey, and as superintendent of roads and tanks, would be of the greatest use to me. He arrived at Nuldroog on the 30th November, and was followed by a second native assistant, Jewanjee Rustomjee, a Parsee, so that now I had two English and two native assistants. Mr Maltby had seen at a glance that it was no use overworking his Deputy-Commissioners. He unfortunately met with a severe accident, which prevented his leaving Hyderabad; and I was much concerned at this, for I had looked forward to his coming with sincere pleasure, and I knew that he was one to appreciate all I had done and was striving further to accomplish.

During my little visit to Sholapoor I made the acquaintance of the surveyor-in-chief for the railway, and I asked him to come with me to see my embankment works, roads, &c., and, above all, to test my survey with the theodolite. He came to Nuldroog, tested the surveys of three considerable village lands, and gave me a certificate that he could find "no appreciable error whatever." Here was a grand triumph for me! Government had refused me a theodolite, and I had been working in my own fashion, and somewhat in the dark.

My system with the plane-tables was quite new to my friend, and he did me the honour to ask me for one of my instruments, which I considered a high compliment. The certificate he had given me was too valuable to retain, as it entered into full details of his tests, and I forwarded it to the Commissioner.

Although he had not seen them in actual working, Mr Maltby ordered at once the adoption of my system of accounts in all departments, and directed it to be put in force in all districts of the Commission. My police regulations had already been adopted, and, at length, what I had been working for so hard seemed to be appreciated; and I received, by a minute of the Supreme Council, the "special thanks of the Governor-General in Council for my valuable services." And so ended the year 1856, with many thanks to God for all His merciful protection. Everything around me was peaceful and prosperous; there was good hope of a fine season; my roads were opening out lines of traffic all through the country; and trade was brisk and profitable.

I had held many criminal trials during the year; but the last one in 1856 was more than usually extraordinary. A farmer and shepherd, the possessor of some wealth, had two wives—one old, the other young. The elder wife had no family, and he had married a younger one in the hope of having an heir born to him. Much jealousy existed between the women, though they did not live in the same house, or even in the same village. One morning, early, the shepherd was found dead in his sugar-cane field, which he had gone to watch alone during the night. His head was literally knocked to pieces with large stones, but the body could be perfectly identified. There had been a feast in his house the evening before, and a kid had been killed by his nephew, and many of the neighbours had partaken of the dinner, at which the shepherd and his elder wife had appeared to be on the best terms. At the inquest and local investigation, many suspicious circumstances were brought forward against the elder wife and the nephew, and both were committed by me for trial. One of these was, that the wife of the nephew declared her husband had been absent most part of that night; and when he returned home he threw a thick sheet over her, which he had with him, saying she must be cold, and that he was going to her village, and she must follow. On this sheet were large patches of blood, which she had not observed at night; but she had given it to the police when they came in the morning. I had sent the sheet to Hyderabad in order that the blood-stains might be analysed; but it could not be proved that the blood was human, and the male prisoner swore that it was that of the kid which he himself had killed for the feast.

There was a great deal of circumstantial evidence in the case ; but it was impossible to convict the prisoners upon this only, and they were very ably defended by a native advocate. When the defence was closed, I was on the point of recording an acquittal, although I was inwardly sure the prisoners had done the murder ; and I had taken my pen in hand to write, when the woman, a tall masculine figure, began to beat her breast, and cried out with a loud voice—

“Stop, Sahib ! do not write ! You do not know the truth ; you would write what is wrong. All that my advocate and the witnesses have said to you is false. Lies ! lies ! lies ! I did the murder, and” (pointing to the nephew) “he helped me ! He knocked him down with a big stone, and then we killed him between us.”

It was quite in vain that I cautioned her that this confession must be made use of against her if she persisted in it. She only said the more—

“Lies ! lies !—we did it, he and I, and he will tell you so himself. Is it not all true ?” she said, turning to the other prisoner. “Don’t be ashamed of it. Speak the truth before God and the Sahib."

"It is all true," said the young man, quite calmly—"quite true; and I will tell how we did it. Was I not his heir? and he had always denied me my share because he said he would have children by his new wife. Could I bear that, Sahib?"

"Could I bear his leaving me for a wooden-faced girl?" cried the woman, beating her breast violently. "No, no! I did it! I did it! I and he; and if he were alive now, and we two were free, we could not let him live. Take down all I say!" she shrieked—"take it all down, and hang me afterwards, for my heart is burning! burning! burning!"

I recorded their confessions, which were long and very circumstantial, not only corroborating the evidence in every material point, but explaining how the murder had been long planned,—how the woman had engaged five men of a village in the British territory to do it, and had given them two rupees each as earnest-money; but their courage failed them, and they had given the money back to her: then, as she said, there remained no one to do it but her husband's nephew and herself. After all was recorded, I passed sentence of death upon both. The proceedings were sent on to the Sudder Adalat or Supreme Court of Calcutta, the sentence confirmed, and the horrible pair hanged together. I shall never forget the look and action of that woman as she cried out to me "not to write," and poured forth a torrent of confession which she could not repress.

In another case of dacoity which followed, the clear evidence of the widow of the owner of the house attacked, who was a young and very beautiful Brahmin girl, affected me very deeply; and the subject of that trial forms the opening of my romance of 'Seeta.' The deposition of Seeta given at the first inquiry is that of the Brahmin widow, with very slight alteration.

Indeed my operations against the dacoits of my district were beginning to tell heavily upon them. One large gang, very notorious in 1827-29, were at length brought to justice, and stolen property to a very large amount was recovered from them and recognised. A zemindar of the adjacent British province, a great man in his way, was also tried and convicted on many charges of dacoity, and was sentenced to fourteen years' penal servitude; and these instances of conviction, and many more, purged my province of dacoits.

New-Year's Day of 1857 found me at Nelingah, where I had been for two days. All was now very prosperous, and the crops were splendid. Every one was in good heart, and applications for waste lands were very numerous; in a comparatively short time none would remain to be taken up. My new assistant, Temple, had gone to work steadily, and was studying Mahratta with every prospect of becoming a proficient. He liked the people, and they liked him; and, as I had before done with Cadell, I made several yearly settlements to show him how the work was done, and he was a very patient and good-tempered scholar. He had been with me on the Hyderabad road so far as it extended, and he completed the survey of two branch lines to Nelingah and Sowára to Latoor—all of these I left to him to look after, as he could afford the time; but the works were making rapid progress everywhere. From Nelingah I went to Kharósa, half-way to Owsa, as I was very anxious to see some Hindoo cave-temples of which I had heard a good deal, and none of the archæologists of Bombay seemed to know anything about them. I found them well worthy a visit—excavated in a cliff of laterite or coarse stone; but some of the pillars left were richly decorated with carving, and several of the halls of the temples were large and airy. The whole were a mini-ature, apparently, of the caves of Ellora, but very humble copies of these noble temples ; and though there did not exist even a tradition of their origin, I concluded they must have been the work of the Rajahs of Kullianee—either the Chalukyas, or their successors the Yádávás of Deoghur or Dowlatabad. I could discover no inscription to copy and send to the Asiatic Society of Bombay, but I measured the temples and sent plans of them, as I did also those of the fine Buddhist excavations near Daraseo, which in many respects were very remarkable, and had been previously unknown.

The day I arrived at Kharósa I received the melancholy intelligence of the death of the Resident, Mr Bushby. He had over-fatigued himself when out on a country excursion, and brought on an illness from which he never rallied. I regretted him very much ; for although we had had some differences of opinion on various local questions, yet to me individually he had been kind and encouraging. We corresponded constantly, and he was ever urging me on to attempt and begin further public works, and expressing satisfaction at the result of those already completed. It was impossible to conjecture who might be his successor.

After staying a few days at Owsa, for the trial of the prisoners confined in the jail there, I went by the new line of road to Sowára and Nuldroog. This latter portion was quite finished, and measured 24 feet in width, looking like a good gravel-walk the whole way. This had before only been a rough track for carts, indeed sometimes merely a path winding among the great basalt boulders. At Nuldroog, the first building I had used as a jail was now too small, and I began enclosing the large magazine with a wall 21 feet high and plastering it inside. There were now 400 prisoners in the jail, and I had established a school of industry, which was going on well. Some of the prisoners were making rope and tape, others weaving, and more manufacturing carpets of strong cotton—some of these were very pretty, and showed much skill. Nor did I allow the women to be idle; they made various articles in a kind of knitting which was taught them, and other kinds of work. The prisoners were likewise set to build the new jail wall, and were useful in a multitude of ways.

After a good look round Nuldroog, just to see that all was right, and testing all the surveys of villages within reach, I went on to Sholapoor for a few days' rest, and to indulge myself in a little music ; and I promised to go there for a long visit during the rains, when I could not move about my district. My friend the surveyor-in-chief was not at Sholapoor, but Lieut. T. of the Artillery, who had belonged to the Trigonometrical Survey of Scinde, accompanied me to Tooljapoor, bringing his theodolite with him. He was curious to see what I was doing, and he remained long enough to test my surveys of several large villages—all of which, I am glad to say, he found correct.

I asked him to make a report to me on the subject, which he did, explaining in detail the tests he had made, and their results, which I sent on to Mr Maltby—and if the Commissioner had any doubt about our work, I knew this report would remove it ; but he wrote word that he was sure we were fully able to carry it on correctly ; and I was rejoiced to find that my plan of using the plane-tables was turning out so thoroughly successful.

I had now leisure to make measurements for the completion of the noble embankment at Bhâtorec, which was one of my principal projects. The high-water level showed an area of upwards of two square miles ; the water would have an average depth of 25 feet, and the irrigation channels on the right bank of the stream would carry water to Ahmednugger itself, which needed it sorely. This great work had been begun, according to tradition, by Salabut Khan, the great Minister of Ahmednugger, who died in 1588, and whose mausoleum overlooks the admirable site for the lake which he had selected. As each would benefit alike by the work, the Nizam's and the British Governments were to share its expenses; and I was so anxious to see it put in hand, that I worked very hard at all the plans, sections, and surveys. Bhâtorce was one of the most delightful of all my villages, and I had constant visitors from the cantonment. Lieut. Cotgrave of the Engineers, with an assistant, was sent to help me.

Between us all, we finished what we had to do; and the cross-levels of this basin gave a result of upwards of sixty millions of cubic yards of water-storage, while the expenses of the work would be comparatively moderate. Mr Cotgrave had not had experience of tank-engineering, but he very soon took in the project, and entered into its details with great spirit and zeal; and on looking into the particulars of the former portion which had been completed, we were both exceedingly struck by the profound science which had been evinced by the ancient Mussulman engineers.

A survey of the high watershed lying between my district and the great valley of the Godavery river was necessary in order to calculate the amount of rainfall for storage in the large tanks I had proposed; and I began this from Bhâtoree, and finished about 100 square miles of it, which all fell into the basin I had tested when I came first to the district.

I had now gained the amplest data for irrigation projects both here and at Bhâtoree; and when I should find leisure to do so, would submit them with my administrative report. How anxious the people were for water!—not only for cultivation, but for their cattle; and what noble memorials would these works be of our rule in the province! I had discovered among the hills a refuge in hot weather—a village 2470 feet above the sea-level by barometer and boiling-point of water. I did not leave it till the end of March, and then it was quite cold at night and very agreeable during the day. The scenery was beautiful all along the mountains to Ahmednugger westwards, and over my own district eastwards; while to the north lay the wide plain of the Godavery, and Aurungabad and its hills beyond. Even with the naked eye I could see the glitter of the marble dome of the great tomb of Aurungzeeb's daughter in the far distance, and of other domes and minarets in the city; but my time was up—I had to meet my assistant Palmer, and to lay out a new piece of road south to Daraseo and north towards the city of Beer. After all was done, the rainy season would begin, and we should assemble at Nuldroog.

My plans were changed by a note received from Colonel Davidson, from Baroda, where, after leaving Hyderabad, he had been appointed Resident. Now, it appeared, he was promoted to the vacancy at Hyderabad, and sent me word that he should be at Nuldroog on the 12th April. I received his note while at Manoor on the 6th, and I had 120 miles to travel over as best I could in order to meet our new chief, who was an old friend of mine. By relays of horses, and a palan-keen from Tooljapoor, I managed to reach Nuldroog on the morning of the 10th, as the sun was rising, and I found everything looking very nice. Next day at 4 A.M. the Resident arrived, and I was very glad to welcome him, and to congratulate him on his new appointment. He had been overworked at Baroda, and looked ill; but the offer of the Hyderabad Residency was too tempting, and he had abandoned his previous idea of going on furlough to England for a few months' leave, until he should have established himself in his new position.

As soon as it was light, he asked to be shown all over the fort, expressed his approval of the new jail, and heard all about my schemes for roads, and all the irrigation projects, to which he promised his help and countenance, declaring that one of his first undertakings at Hyderabad would be to complete the road to a junction with my frontier. I explained the progress of the survey, and, in short, everything connected with my work in all departments, and he had not one single objection to offer to any of my plans. He stayed with us till the evening, Temple having ridden in from Owsa during the day; and we then sent him on, with our hearty good wishes for a safe journey, and after this relapsed into our usual monotonous routine of daily work.

I returned to my camp, and made surveys and plans for the last large tank I had to prepare for execution in the ensuing year. It would collect the drainage of  $57\frac{1}{2}$  square miles; would have an average depth of 24 feet, and an area of  $13\frac{1}{4}$  square miles; and would, when completed, be a truly noble work.

I had much anxiety at this time about many things, and one especially was the very severe illness of my father-in-law Mr Palmer, who throughout my life had been so steady, loving, and truly helpful a friend to me in all my doings. He recovered, however, very slowly; but his son, my assistant, was obliged to leave me and go to Hyderabad for advice about his eyes, which began to fail him terribly. He could now scarcely see to write his name, and was unfit for duty. I took charge of his subdivision myself; and the travelling season being over, returned to Nuldroog by the close of May.

On my way to Nuldroog, my assistant Baba Sahib had met me at Daraseo, and in course of a conversation which we held privately, he told me that very disagreeable rumours had been flying about that disaffection prevailed in the British territory, and that it was reported an attempt would soon be made to turn the British out of India altogether.

I had heard this myself, but it had made no impression upon me. Who could or would think it could be true, while the whole of India lay apparently in profound peace? Who could dream of any rising?

“Do you remember,” said Baba Sahib, “the anonymous letter sent to you by the Bombay Government some time ago? I think it was in February; that was a warning, and kindly meant, though it sounded rude and insolent. Now the almanac for this year 1914 is most alarming; it goes back to the 'hundred years' of the battle of Plassey, and declares that the rule of the Company must come to an end in bloodshed and tumult. This is what is disturbing men's minds, and we must be very careful. When I saw the almanac for the year, I had almost determined to write to you to have it stopped, and prevent the public reading of it if possible; but I knew that you would say such a step would give it too much importance. Do you not hear ugly rumours yourself?"

I scarcely liked to confess that I had; but since February I had been receiving several anonymous letters sent through the ordinary post, with various post-marks, all warning me, as a friend to natives, to take furlough to England and join my family, and leave the district to its fate. They were worded mostly in this way;—

"Although you have many friends, and the people worship you, you have still enemies who will approach you when the time comes, and you will never know who strikes you down."

All these letters were marked "private," or "to be read by himself," and, like other anonymous productions, which were common enough, I had read them and then torn them up. I had not the smallest fear of the people in my district ; but these letters, taken in connection with those which had been sent confidentially to Lord Elphinstone, had more effect upon me than I cared to acknowledge.

The advent of 1914 had been preceded by frightful cholera and floods in Bengal, discontent about the greased cartridges, and the mutiny of the 19th Bengal Native Infantry ; but such events seemed to have no possible connection with the general uprising of the people ; and even if, in Bengal, they were suspicious of infringements of caste, what could that possibly have to do with the peaceful and apparently loyal farmers of the Deccan ?

In Bengal, however, there now appeared to be real alarm. Lord Canning's proclamation of May 16th proved that there was, as there seemed to me to be, direct sympathy between what the people of Bengal were warned of by Lord Canning and what I knew was being felt all round me. I could only infer that the evil prophecy of the curious almanac, the same in purport everywhere, had in reality disturbed the minds of the unthinking and superstitious. What could be done? I heard the same apprehensive reports from Hyderabad. The Resident and others wrote to me about them; and from Ahmednugger, Sholapoor, Berar, and other localities, came the same tidings: and out of all the letters which reached me and Temple, there was scarcely one which did not make some reference to the subject.

I confess I was considerably relieved when I received an order to remit all the money I had in the treasury to Bombay for the Persian war. I felt, in any case, it was better to be without it.

I well remember the receipt of the "Extra" from Meerut of the 11th May. Who that was in India at that time can forget it? One could not but shudder at the awful news; but there arose a hope that it might only be a local mutiny which could be checked without spreading further, and that peace would soon follow; and yet, if common precaution had been taken at every station as early as February or March, before the evil wind of 1914 began to blow, many and many a valuable life would have been spared. Now it was too late, for throughout the Bengal army disaffection was widely prevalent, and was beginning to bear fruit almost day by day everywhere. Warnings had not been wanting. Friendly natives had endeavoured by many means to put Englishmen on their guard; but no hints were taken, no precautions used, and the blow fell at last.

The following letters were written home to my friends, though with no view to publication at the time; but for the convenience of my family and others interested in the subject, they were printed and circulated privately without my knowledge:—

NELDEROOG (WESTERN CEDED DISTRICTS, DECCAN),

No Government despatch that ever left India will be looked for with such anxiety as the mail which takes this. The close of the Affghan war was a period of intense excitement; but then it was for an army retiring, and one which could, united as it was, have borne down everything before it. Now the fear arises from the army itself. To say that a Bengal army exists, is, I fear, hopeless. The list of regiments that have broken into open mutiny, or have been disbanded because of disaffection, has extended to more than half the regular regiments already, and who shall say how far it may not extend? How will it be possible to trust any after this? Happily, as yet, no disaffection has been manifested in the Bombay or Madras armies, and the native

States are one and all faithful. There has been excitement at Hyderabad, of course, and one night a standard was planted, around which some rabble assembled; but the Minister sent a party of Arabs to keep order, and those assembled fled, nor has any attempt at sedition been renewed. Davidson has a small detachment and a few guns at the Residency, more to assure the people of the Residency Bazaar than aught else; and all is quiet. There had been suspicion of communication between disaffected parties in the native regiments and the city rabble, but no trace could be found; and such reports have been common at all times, for the last twenty years, in any periods of general excitement. The Minister and Nizam are steadily with us; and it seems they have the Arabs in hand, which perhaps some doubted. Of course the general interest is now centred in Delhi; and I think and hope that you will hear of its fall by this mail. News, by electric telegraph, to Davidson, of the 2d, from Delhi, said that a breach had been made; but the most material was, that the king had thrown himself on our protection, and that the mutineers were divided among themselves. They had been defeated with great slaughter outside the walls, by our troops, under General Barnard; and the results of their two attacks on the outpost of the Meerut post on the Hindun, were also slaughter and defeat. That the whole will be quelled, and speedily too, I have not the least doubt; but, meantime, it is a period of intense anxiety and excitement, as you may believe. It is most satisfactory to see the people of our newest provinces—the Punjaub and Oudh—as yet unmoved by what is going on. Those of the North-West have not been loyal, and more plundering has been carried on by the rural population about the large stations than by the mutineers. Here we are all perfectly quiet, and I trust in God may remain so. With a purely agricultural population there are no elements of excitement; and unless it be among any of the chiefs in the Southern Mahratta country, no chance of disaffection exists on this side India.

One naturally asks what has been the cause of all this—of a whole army becoming at once disaffected, and officers and men, Hindoo and Mohanmedan, abandoning allegiance, pay, and pensions,—risking all in this wild attempt to subvert the Government, for no one can doubt that that is the end aimed at. It is not only that present advantages have been risked, or considerations of them thrown away; future considerations are involved as well. All sepoys, or most of the Bengal army, are connected with land,—there was hardly a farmer or proprietor of any kind who had not a son or relative in the army; many were themselves landed proprietors: all are known, and, as traitors, have forfeited their estates. It would seem also, by the wanton butchery of officers, and by the measures at once pursued, that it was desired to leave no chance of accommodation or retreat. I suppose all this will come out some day. It is impossible but that a commission must be appointed to sift the whole to the bottom, and devise a remedy. The authorities, blindly confident, or timid, or conceited as they may have been, must open their eyes now, and not only look danger in the face, but provide against its recurrence. Some people talk of Russia; but I cannot think what she can have to do with it, or how secret means could have been devised for the corruption of the army. That a general conspiracy was made, who can doubt?—the fact of the circulation of those mysterious cakes of bread last year showed this, though no one suspected the sepoys, or at least declared that they did.

But observant men have done so for many years. I have never met an officer who had seen Bengal troops, who was not amazed at their lax discipline. Colonel Jacob, long ago, said that the “normal condition of the Bengal army was mutiny,” for which he was nearly losing his commission; but it was fact. At Mooltan, and through the whole of the Punjaub war, the men were hardly to be trusted; and after it, Sir Charles Napier had to quell one mutiny, which had not the appearance of being an isolated ebullition of feeling, though it did not spread. Caste has been the bane of that army, and it has been most strange to me always to hear caste spoken of as an advantage. Brahmin sepoys are, no doubt, a fine race; physically, no finer men exist; temperate and well-behaved always, and they are liked by officers; but they have viewed with dread the gradually extending territory of the British beyond seas, which to them are dreadful, and yet where they might sooner or later have to go—nay, would have to go. Enlistment is only made for general service now; and while it has been made by young hands, to get the only service possible, the old hands had not taken the oath, and it must have been an object of the lower and younger grades to free themselves from theirs. There are many reasons why mutiny has broken out, which I see are prominently given in the newspapers—foreign service, suspicion about the Enfield cartridges, general lax discipline, absence of European troops, and the like; but there are others which I do not see noticed at all, but which strike me as having had some effect. These are: 1st, The way in which the Commission in Oudh has been working, and its result as regards the landholders. This class—petty Rajahs, Thakoors, and landholders of all degrees—are powerful under the native governors, and lawless to a degree. They had as much land as they liked, and paid only what they chose. The Government was at perpetual feud with them; and they had the best of it, I suspect. Now that is all changed, and there can be no distinction of persons. 2dly, It is said that the appointments in the Commission, as regards the heads of it, were not good—too many regulation men—and that the revenue screw was not spared at all. I do not know how this is, but suspect that all combined has had more to do with the Mutiny than any other cause—or if not more, that it has had the effect of arousing to action all other subjects of real or fancied discontent. 3dly, I doubt also whether the revenue system of the North-West Provinces is sound—Thomason's system, so belauded by its supporters. It has not secured property to the middle classes; and the yeomen, who are our sepoys, have lost lands, which are swallowed up by moneyed men. The Santhal rebellion was of this kind; but there, interest and exorbitant charges on money transactions had driven savages to despair. The middle classes of tenants in the North-West are not savages, and watch and have watched with jealousy the operation of laws and courts which have sold up old properties and encumbered new ones. I cannot dilate on these subjects; but keep them in mind, and I think you will see hereafter that they have had effect banefully to weaken attachment which might have been secured by other means.

I am confident in your English resources. It will be seen that a very large force of European troops is needed for India, and that henceforth they must be en masse, as Sir Charles Napier most truly observed and urged. Isolated parties are of no use, and, as in case of the assembly at Delhi, can only be got together after long delays, and then inefficiently. I have no doubt the Government will send from 10,000 to 20,000 men directly, and meantime what there are will hold their own at least; but I hope the Delhi matter will have been settled by this time, and, after that, the rest is rather of detail only. Without money, without leaders, without guns, resources, or ammunition, what can a rabble of sepoys do? Social mischief only; and that, horrible as it has been and may be, is the price at which we are purchasing experience. Perhaps, in the end, all will be better than before. Illusions will be dispelled, and there will be no trifling with danger. There must be a native army, but that of Bengal will not be what it has been. There will be more European cavalry and infantry, and more artillery; more irregular levies or armed police: in short, we shall be wiser and sadder, and shall not trust, as we seem to have been doing for many years, to our good fortune or prestige. This, too, may have been one of those solemn warnings, given in God's providence, resulting from struggles in men's minds between forms of belief—the fact between heathenism and Christianity. What the Saxons were to Charlemagne, the Hindoos, mutatis mutandis, may be to us. A great struggle between light and darkness, civilisation and savages, is no doubt progressing, and, like others before it, will have its phases of excitement and misery. Lord Canning is doing well now, but was not decisive enough perhaps at first. Yet who shall say it?

MEADOWS TAYLOR.

You will read with horror in England the accounts from the Bengal stations, where regiments have mutinied. I will not dwell upon them. Mutiny, and a declaration for the sepoy's cause, whatever it is, might have been expected in an organised rising of this kind; but it is clear now that the extermination of officers, with their wives and families, was one main object—and, alas! it has been accomplished with fiendish barbarity in many instances. I cannot think otherwise than that England will be stirred as she has rarely been stirred before; and that it has needed but the perusal of the accounts of the last month, and even of the last fortnight, to arouse a spirit of vengeance against these miscreant sepoys, such as has been rarely, if ever, displayed among you, and that troops will be sent out instantly in large numbers. We have not yet heard of the fall of Delhi—that is the point on which all interest centres at present; and the operations there are not known, except that General Barnard had repulsed three sorties from the place, with great loss to the mutineers. By the last accounts—that is, up to the 16th—the General was waiting for some reinforcements from the Punjaub, which had reached Umballa on their way down to him. I daresay the place is strong; and as all in it are fighting with halts in prospect if taken, they are doubtless desperate ; and it is clear nothing can be risked. Reports have come down country to Bombay that the place has been taken, but they are not officially confirmed as yet ; so we must wait in patience. They are strong in Calcutta, and I daresay by this time have some of the Chinese troops there ; if so, they will be pushed up the country with all speed. The Punjaub is quiet—no rising or disturbance—which speaks well for the local administration. All through the Deccan and south of India there is entire tranquillity. Hyderabad is well in hand by Davidson, who will get credit for what he has done. The Nizam and the Minister are staunch, and the Arabs well in hand also ; they have no sympathy with the Bengal movement, or with a king of Delhi, and will be faithful to us. Here we are all quiet and peaceable as any one could wish, and also in all the adjoining districts, British and Nizam's. We were rather apprehensive, a week ago, that a regiment of Nizam's Contingent cavalry, which had mutinied at Aurungabad, and was at first stated to be in full march on its station, Mominabad, about sixty miles from this, might make a dash at us for the sake of the treasury ; but that report was false. No men moved from Aurungabad till General Woodburn's force arrived there by a forced march of seventy miles from Ahmednugger. The General went straight to the cavalry lines, surrounded the regiment, when the greatest number of the men submitted at once—in fact, joined him ; but some remained till a charge or two of grape was sent among them, when they fled for the most part, sixty-four being taken prisoners. Of these, several have been hanged, and some transported ; and the example will have a good effect—no doubt, indeed has had, for no one has stirred elsewhere. I have about eighty of the men of this corps on duty in the district, but all have behaved well, and seem right glad to be out of the mess. There was an ugly sort of conspiracy at Sattara, when the matter first broke out; but Rose, the Collector there, who is a good officer, has nipped it in the bud, and all is square again.

You will see that the ex-king of Oudh has been confined, and that Government have a clue to his participation in the matter. I have from the first thought that Oudh was the cause of this. Our Bengal army are Oudh men for the most part; and, as I may have said before, the check on habitual lawlessness in Oudh, and no less lawlessness in the ranks of the army, was hardly to be endured. No doubt the conspiracy has been long matured. It has been no cartridge question, or any other question, but a struggle to break bonds, which were getting tighter every day. If this outbreak had not occurred, the crisis would have come in some other form, and might possibly have been worse. As it is, it is only a question of time. The Ganges is rising fast, and steamers can get up with troops easily and quickly. 5000 men from China will hold everything till you can send us more; but for some years to come India will require many more European troops than she has had. In this Lord Dalhousie failed, that he trusted the native army when it was clear they were not in hand as soldiers should be. With a new annexation at one end in the Punjaub, and one in the middle—and considering the character of Oudh, which was far more lawless than the Punjaub ever was—there should have been a heavy European force there and at Delhi. All this is too late now: we have only to retrieve the losses, and our power will be stronger than ever, and the attachment of all well-disposed classes greater; for it is clear to all, when any disorganisation ensues, what will be the result to property. Government will be sadder but wiser; and the administration of India for the next hundred years more civilised than it has been since Plassey. The savagery of the worst State in India has had its burst—a fearful one it has been—but the retribution will be as fearful. All these men are landed proprietors in Oudh. Dare they return there to be hunted down? Every man's name is known, and his place of residence; and when our turn begins again, woe to them! Small mercy will be shown to the violators and murderers of English women and helpless children. As it is, there appears a lull. About half the Bengal army has not stirred. Many of the corps are doing good service, and will perhaps wait to see the issue of Delhi. By-and-by, as corps move up from Calcutta, the rebels will be between two fires. We know they have no ammunition or material in shot and shell but what may have been got at Delhi, and no ammunition but what was found there. Where are they to get caps for their muskets, which are all percussion? We see at Benares that they threw away 1400 stand of arms. Now, if they kept their arms and discipline, they might be formidable; but without either, they are no more than the rabble, which has never yet stood—and never can—regular armies. So I see good hope in prospect; and as we must have had it out one day, the worst is over, I think. Every one will blame Lord Dalhousie, I daresay. I only see that he was wrong in not covering his annexations with sufficient European troops, and this the Russian war prevented his doing. We ought to hear by the mail coming in what you say at home to the beginning of the Mutiny. But we cannot hear what you know of the worst for another fortnight, or month perhaps. This mutiny will give us an electric telegraph to you, no doubt, when you can hear daily news from India. But we should be thankful that we have at least steam to carry over distress to you in a month, and perhaps gain help. You will see that men are equal to the emergency. Lawrence at Lucknow has done wonders. Colonel Neil and his Madras Fusiliers are renowned already—a gallant-spirited man as any we have. In the Punjaub, too, they have determined men and troops enough, as they have got rid of all the Bengal men. We only want troops for the North-Western Provinces and Central India, and we shall be all right in a few months. Meanwhile, the more anxious England is the better.

You will see what Lord Canning has done about the press. I think it was needed now; but it may be relaxed, except to native prints, hereafter. And I hope these murders and massacres will ease Exeter Hall and its party of some of its cant in regard to "sympathy with natives."

I am quite well—and here, but that we read newspapers, should have no anxiety whatever. Tell this to all who ask after me. God bless you! and believe me ever yours faithfully,

MEADOWS TAYLOR.

[In the month of August Captain Taylor was promoted to the Deputy-Commissionership in North Berar, and proceeded to his new station at Booldana.]

JAUUNAU, September 7, 1857.

I have got so far on my journey to my new country, —that is, about three-fourths of the distance. We cannot travel luxuriously as you do, but I have come about 180 miles in nine days, with my tents and servants well up, which is not bad work. I give all a rest here, and hope that Bullock will come in from Booldana to-day, till when I shall occupy myself with writing, and first to you. I had intended to have done so on the road; but the double marches, evening and morning, though they are not over ten or twelve miles at the most, interrupt every attempt to settle to anything. My journey has been a very pleasant one; there was no rain to speak of: and through the Nizam's country, in which I could not possibly have been treated with greater civility and distinction had I been the Resident himself, deputations met me from all the large towns and stations, and I was helped on in every way I could desire. The country is perfectly peaceful and loyal to us. But it is sad to see so much of it waste, and to hear the people complaining, not so much of active oppression, as of no one taking the least interest in them, except to screw what can be got out of them. I see, however, changes for the better in the system of district management, and there seems to be a system at last; but it must be, even with Salar Jung, that he has little assistance, much opposition, and in all cases very lukewarm co-operation. I trust, however, that a man so thoroughly in earnest and single in purpose will succeed as he deserves to do. His conduct through the trying crisis of June and July has been very admirable ; and as it has passed the ordeal of the Mohurram safely, Hyderabad may be considered thoroughly safe, I think, as its people throughout the country are entirely well affected.

You ask me in your last what the effect of this mutiny upon the princes of India seems to be. It is not an easy question to answer, but I will give you my opinions ; and, unless we sustain very unlooked-for and serious reverses, I do not think they will alter. At present, then, I think all is in a satisfactory state. Certainly there is no sympathy with the mutincor sepoys, neither politically nor as far as creed is concerned. The papers will give you details, but not one of the large States has moved or openly displayed sympathy with the sepoy movement. Wherever these Poorbia sepoys, whether Hindoos or Mussulmans, have had service, they have mutinied and gone towards Delhi, as they did from our service. Contingents of native princes which at first appeared loyal to us, but which consisted of the same classes of soldiers as our men, broke away as well from us as from their nominal masters and joined the general confederacy. You see this exemplified in the events at Indore and Gwalior, and the cases of the Kotah contingent, Bhopal people, &c. ; but as soon as Holkar was rid of his mutinous soldiery, who marched to Delhi, and his own Mahrattas rallied round him, he welcomed the Resident back, and matters now are much safer and quieter than before. The princes of Rajpootana have been loyal and stanch, I believe, to a man, helping with their men as far as was needed. I can, however, readily understand their not sending large bodies into the field, with an infectious spirit abroad, and without any apparent head, knowing that there is amongst them as strong a love for plunder and anarchy as existed in the time of the Pindharees, nay worse. Native States have therefore kept quiet, sending only what they themselves could entirely depend on; and in this they have been right.

That there is any combination among native States against us, I have no suspicion; and a combination to set up a head, as an Emperor of Delhi, would, I should think, be the last thing that any one of them wanted. If it were possible that such a result followed, even for a while, the impossibility of cohesion is most transparent to all; while the certainty of exacting, extortion, plunder, and insecurity of property, is alike clear to every one. Better, therefore, as it is, to them; and they are accordingly quiet, if not active and sympathising friends. At a first glance you might think that the Nizam State would sympathise with a "Delhi Raj." But the Nizams were faithless to Delhi, utterly so, and would have to pay a heavy reckoning, nay, be utterly extinguished, if possible. The Mahratta princes, what remain of them, hold territories wrested from Delhi. Would they be spared? The Rajpoot princes, the oldest feudatories of Delhi, have, as I have said, displayed active sympathy with us, retaining and protecting the political agents with them, and helping with supplies, and in other ways of which the papers give details. I have from the first looked anxiously to see whether any grand political movement or confederation could be detected, but as yet there appears none, and I think the Government will have the same intelligence from the Governor-General.

No; as yet the movement appears confined to the Bengal army, and to that portion of it which is called Poorbia or Hindoostanee. The Sikhs will have none of it: Goorkhas are stanch; but wherever these Poorbias are, there are disaffection and open savagery of the worst description. The reason of this is as yet a profound mystery. That the whole of the Bengal army was prepared to rise about the 15th May, there can be no doubt now; and that its rising was not simultaneous, has been providential. Even now, regiments that have been disarmed break away occasionally. Corps of irregular cavalry that have been considered stanch, mutiny and make off to plunder, and join, if they can, the Delhi or Rohilkund parties, even without arms, or pay, or plunder. To doubt, therefore, a preconcerted plan in this mutiny would be absurd. It has existed, and exists; and out of the whole Bengal army I do not think there are at present more than half-a-dozen Poorbia regiments who are stanch, or who have proved loyalty by action. It will be long before the origin of the movement is known. Whether, as has been supposed, it is in reality a plot of the Delhi princes to attempt to regain sovereignty,—whether it is owing to intrigues in Oudh,—whether an attempt among a powerful body, bound together as the Hindoo Poorbias are by one bond of religious belief, to establish a dominion of military priests as existed in the ancient days of Hindooism,—or whether it is one of these outbreaks of savagery against civilisation, of which we have instances innumerable in the history of civilisation, remains to be seen. My own impressions lead me much to the latter belief. Civilisation is pressing hard on Hindooism, perhaps also on Mohammedanism: I do not say Christianity, for that as yet is far off; but that amount of civilisation which has proved progression of knowledge to be incompatible with Hindooism, and to be sapping its very existence. This may have led to conspiracy among Brahmins, and by them the Rajpoots or Kshettriya classes have been aroused to action. These classes compose the Bengal army. There are no others. Hindoostanee Mussulmans are much Hindooised, and were originally part of the Hindoo people. Hence, when it became necessary, there has been for the time a complete identification of the interests of all. Again, for the last fifty years we have been breeding up a race of stalwart priests for our army. In the most deplorable manner we have strengthened every prejudice by enlisting none but them. The magnificent men of that army were the admiration of all, they were accordingly pampered and indulged by all; they would not allow intermixture of other classes; they recruited themselves; and each corps, from the officers down to the lowest private, were not only classmen, but fellow-priests as Brahmins, or holy warriors as Kshettriyas. Can anything more pregnant with mischief be imagined? Yet so vain were Bengal officers of their men, and of their men's caste, which was the strangest thing, that mention or thought of anything low-caste was ridiculed,—and the Madras and Bombay armies held as things of nought. So it went from bad to worse, as regards discipline; and while the sepoy strengthened themselves in their regiments, civilisation was treading hard on their heels outside. Sepoys were not educated men, except in ceremonials as Brahmins. Education was spreading over Bengal and the North-West Provinces very fast. It would have followed into Oudh, and as yet Oudh was a stronghold of dark Hindoo fanaticism. The Oudh Brahmins are known by other Brahmins for their attachment to, and study of, the mystic rites of Bhowanee or Kali. These rites are held in abhorrence by Deccan Brahmins; they call them fearful and unholy, and those among them who have knowledge of them are held in dread by the rest. Of such are the Bengal sepoy, the Brahmins and Rajpoots of Oudh and as far south as Benares. And since they have broken forth and shown themselves in their true colours, it has not surprised me to see that the mask completely thrown off has displayed in savagery that spirit which in those districts produced Thuggee, which had its most noted leaders from among these very classes. I have given you these reasons to explain why I think this more a movement of savagery against civilisation than aught else, and I still adhere to my opinion that the annexation of Oudh was the incentive to this outbreak. Perhaps the way in which Oudh was managed at first, and till Lawrence got it, made it more immediate than it otherwise would have been. Outram took Oudh, but has always eschewed details of management. The first managing man under him was a thorough-bred Bengal civilian, as the phrase goes,—haughty, quarrelsome, imperious, and a red-tapist of the worst school. So I have heard him described. He did much mischief, no doubt; and then must have begun the organisation, or the idea of it. Strange to say, Lord Dalhousie could not see danger in trusting a new country to the military occupation of a people whose freedom (lawlessness is a better word) his measures were curtailing every day. He too believed in the Bengal sepoy as others did. Yet he was bringing that sepoy's father and brothers into subjection, looking after and taxing their lands, preventing them from indulging in outrages and dacoity. For years and years we have recruited from Oudh; and for years and years we have known the Oudh population to be the most lawless in India. Was it expected that it would like civilisation, or a strong Government, or restraint of any kind? And were not the very men we enlisted as lawless in their way as their brethren at home,—refusing foreign service, refusing discipline, refusing intermixture of other castes? All this was: some saw it, and some wrote about it. Those who did write about it, either to the public or to Government, were marked and ruined men; they were never advanced. Many people are getting courage to speak out now, but it is too late. It was a pleasant delusion, that Bengal army, while it lasted; and so were all other Bengal delusions pleasant—nothing was like them. The men who held them were inflated; they were, in fact, Bengal civilians, and who should gainsay them? — wrote to me only the other day that he knew every one, for years past, who had striven publicly or privately to expose these delusions, had been a marked man. So it went on. One would have thought that when last year the cakes of bread flew through the North-West Provinces, it would have aroused suspicion of some intrigue, or would have been traced. What notice was taken of it? None, that I know of; or if any suspicion was entertained it was shut up. If Government knew of suspected disaffection—or if at any time what Napier wrote, what others hinted, what even broke out in occasional mutiny, was known,—and I am impressed with a conviction that it was known, and feared too,—why was India left so defenceless in regard to European troops? But this is another part of the subject, now, alas! causing waste of life and treasure, which will keep India back for years.

There is another matter, or cause of disaffection, which I will briefly mention, because it affects the people of the country. I have doubted the revenue system of the North-West Provinces very much ever since I knew it. It has made village communities throw off attachment to Government, I think, by weakening the bond between them; and it has reduced the bond of the landholders, whether great or small, to a simple question of money-payment, the most easily broken. It has also given headmen too much influence, and reduced village communities to a state of vassalage to them, rather than retaining them in a direct communication with Government authorities. This system is the far-famed "Thomason" system; one which, no doubt, got in most money with least cost—but otherwise, I think, and have always thought, was regardless of the people, and regardless of the bond which should have been maintained, rather than broken. You see the result now in some shape. Leaders of villages have abused authority, petty chiefs have leagued with them, both parties have taken to plundering property not belonging to their own classes. Here and there, there are symptoms of revulsion, and the people, tired of being plundered, have risen on their headmen, and invited back the European magistrates; and this will progress, I think and trust, as if to show, without doubt, the utter inability of these people to rule themselves without plunder and massacre, and the utter insecurity of property in whatever shape it may exist. This may have its effect in time in restoring order; but the operation of reducing to order a country which has become disorganised is necessarily slow at any time, and one can hardly see or think whom to trust when Government has crushed, as it will crush, the originators of the Mutiny. It is sad to think, too, that all the promotion of natives to offices of trust and confidence has in most instances proved futile to check disorder or maintain authority. There have been, it is true, some faithful men, some bright instances of personal exertion to aid our authority, but they are lamentably few; and it must be almost more bitter to those who have selected these authorities to see them supine or faithless, than to encounter the mad savagery of the native army. It is too soon now to speculate upon final results as to the civil government of the country. It may, it is true, be comparatively easy when order is once more established; but the shock to all has been a rude and violent one. The civilisation of mind, which most of us thought had made progress, proves to be only skin-deep, and not to have affected the masses of the people at all, and will have to be commenced again, I hope in a more earnest and practical spirit than before. I adhere to my opinion that a government on the part of the Crown will be the best policy to pursue, and there can be no doubt that a double Government will not answer. Whether it is understood by the people, that the Company has been, as it were, abandoned by the Crown—that it only occupies the place of “farmers” of the country, or is in the position of a weak interloper, and can be thrown off—I do not know; but there is much in the discussions on the renewal of the charter, and the comparative absence of European troops, to favour the supposition in minds which cannot understand European politics or the constitution of our own country. I see that Sir Erskine Perry has already made a motion on the subject; but the extent of the calamity must be fully known before a remedy can be applied, and I think the result will be a Government into which no division of authority can enter. No one will be hardy enough now to support the doctrine that India can be governed by opinion. It must be by European troops well distributed that government can be maintained. I shall be anxious to see what turn your counsels take on this subject, one on which all in India are well assured that England is doing her best, and that the past will be retrieved in time.

I have nothing particular to say of myself. I was very sorry to leave the Nuldroog district; the people were quiet and attached, the country was fast improving, and improvements as to roads and other matters were in active progress. I do not know on what principles Berar has been managed, and have to get acquainted with the people,—a long matter, with a district of its size. I will write you more from Booldana by-and-by, and when I see my way into what is before me. God bless you.—With my dear love to all kindred, believe me ever yours faithfully,

MEADOWS TAYLOR.

BOOLDANA, NORTH BERAR, September 26, 1857.

I arrived here on the 14th, and took charge of the district, and your letter of the 6th of August reached me a few days after. I wrote to you from Jaulnah, when staying there to wait for Bullock, and I hope that letter has come safe to hand. I do not think I have missed any mail since this war began; for such as my opinions are, and means of observation, I am anxious you should have the result of them for yourself, apart from all public discussions which reach you from India and are made in England. You have done my first letter much honour,—more than it deserved, I fear, for it was written in a hurry, and in some alarm perhaps, and more than there need have been; and yet I cannot say I have ever felt alarm for anything south of the Nerbudda since the Mutiny broke out, and as yet, you see, we are safe. So long as Hyderabad remains quiet and attached, there is no apprehension, I think, for Southern India; and I sincerely believe that it is both. The Mohurrun passed off quietly, and there is no excitement at present. On one point they appear obliged to temporise, which is, the trial of Torra Borg Khan, the Rohilla zemindar who led the attack on the Residency. He has not been hanged, as he ought to have been, nor given up, nor will the head of the Adalut in Hyderabad condemn him for taking part in a holy war; it would be against Mohammedan laws, and the Minister appears helpless in respect of bringing him to punishment for the present. He is, however, still in confinement, and it is safe policy not to press anything at the present. I have no apprehension of any Mahratta league. In the Deccan the old Mahratta families are weak, and I do not think there is any one who would have sympathy with Sindia after the long break there has been in the connection. The Brahmin influence was never liked by the true Mahratta families, and he would not join Nana Sahib, the representative of the Peshwah, nor would the Sattara family. There have been reports that Sindia was deposed by his troops, and Delhi proclaimed. But this wants confirmation, and is not believed. Holkar, the Guicowar, and the Kolapore chief, the Jagheerdars in the South Mahratta country, are all stanch and quiet, and, whether singly or collectively, are too weak to attempt coalition; such at least is my impression, and I imagine Lord Elphinstone says the same. The Mahratta people of the Deccan, too, are well off as to employment and landed settlements; they appear to me to have ceased to be warlike in every way, and, under a good system of government and easy taxation, have fairly abandoned old ways and settled down into active farmers. No doubt there were some intrigues at Satara which were put down with a strong hand by Rose, the Collector, who behaved admirably. There were some plots also at Poona and Belgaum, got up by low adventurers, without leaders or means, but having a bad animus. These also were promptly discovered and the conspirators executed. The reported mutiny of one Bombay regiment at Kolapore caused some alarm for the time lest it should spread; but it was an attempt by the Hindoostanees of the regiment, which was, beyond anything we have seen yet, insane and futile; and these men were disposed of very gallantly by the Mahratta Horse and the true men of their own corps. In this matter the Kolapore Rajah was well affected, and gave what help he could; and you know he is one of the representatives of Sivajee, and many of the old Mahratta families hold by him and his little court. The Brahmins of the Deccan are not military people in any way, and they are well represented and provided for in Government employ. I do not think there is discontent among them, and if there were, they have no sympathy among the Mahratta people, who do not like them. Under all these points of view, I do not think there is ground for apprehension of any Mahratta rising or combination, and I hope my views may be ultimately correct.

Now the more I look back to what I wrote to you first, the more I am inclined to adhere to the opinions I then expressed, and have since repeated. The Mohammedan sympathy in the movement has been secondary as far as the people are concerned, even in the North-West Provinces, but the share of the King of Delhi and his large family of soi-disant Shahzadahs in the original plot, while it remains to be investigated, is meantime borne out by facts. I have long considered the Bengal army utterly unsafe. It had become impossible to control the priestly faction of which it was composed, and to which all others were subordinate; for the Mohammedan portion of it was just as arrogant in respect to caste prejudices as the Hindoo, and followed the Hindoo lead. It was impossible to convince Bengal officers of the mischief attending any caste as an element of military service under us. No attempt was made, or could have been made (except by taking the bull by the horns, which no one dared to do), to break down the caste influence, except by the very partial effort of the enlistment of sepoys on oath for general service—which of course, and as might have been foreseen, was useless in contact with the old and very powerful element of the former system. I dare say this was admitted by those who chose to think—and I will venture to say there were few who did not; still, the old prejudice in favour of high-caste Brahmins, arising no doubt out of the comparative ease by which they were managed as soldiers in garrison, the fine appearance of the men, and the bravery occasionally displayed in recent times, with the prestige of old victories, all combined to perpetuate the illusion ; and while the soldiery were led to look up to the service as an hereditary right, they became the less disposed to brook any interference with it. You see how these men were spreading fast into the Bombay army. As Hindoostanee men rose to rank as subadars and native officers in general, and returned to their native villages, they were employed to bring down batches of recruits, fine stalwart young fellows, who enlisted readily, and no doubt served well. Mahrattas, as their country has been settled, and become, as it is, one expanse of cultivation, needed no employment for their young men, and, except the very lowest classes, did not enlist in the army. Those regiments into which a Hindoostanee element has been once infused, became more and more Hindoostanee from year to year ; and the 16,000 men said now to be in the Bombay army would have been doubled in a few years more, with the same kind of contrivance, the same views, and no doubt eventually the same conduct as the Bengal army itself. Happily, most happily, this has been broken up. The design of enlisting any more of these people, and the danger of even allowing what there are to remain, is too imminent to be overlooked, and it will be averted. In the Madras army I believe there are a few Hindoostanees here and there, but very few, and they will, I trust, be got rid of. But in the Madras army there is another influence not unlike what prevailed in Bengal, which needs to be checked in time ; this is the Mohammedan, and you will do good service by bringing it to notice in those quarters where it can be remedied. The military portion of the Mohammedans of the Madras

Presidency lie about Arcot, Seringapatam, Vellore, and other places, and are exclusively military, looking, as the Bengal and Oudh Brahmins did, to hereditary services. They are known to be bigoted, and even natives mistrust the Thull Ghat Mussulman as turbulent and unfaithful. They have their old ideas of rule under the Mysore dominion of Hyder and Tippoo, brief but brilliant—possibly have no sympathy with Delhi, but true sympathy with the cause of Islam. They are not cultivators, like the Sikhs and Mahrattas, but look to service as sepoys—in short, to a military life, rather than to any other, and have found it in the Madras army to a great extent. It is only necessary that this combination, which provides all the cavalry and many of the infantry regiments, should not be allowed to proceed as it has done in Bengal; and there is plenty of time to avert it. I have known many men who thought that the more a regiment was connected by family ties the better; but we now see the danger of it as regards the Bengal army, and, under the constitution of the native mind, everywhere the same; and the danger attending combination induced by a sense of power, I think should be prevented. I am not writing or thinking any wrong of the Madras army, which as yet has proved wonderfully stanch and obedient in many trying times and foreign wars: I only wish to prevent the possibility of its becoming other than it is and has been—the possibility of its gaining that conviction of power, which has destroyed the Bengal army, as it will assuredly any other army which is infected by it. By what means this can be best effected is not in my power to state. It must be done silently, gradually, and without exciting suspicion. I have often thought a partial admission of half-castes, as also enlistment of negroes, or some of the martial Cape tribes, would be good, and negroes best of all; and often and often, in old letters, have I dwelt on this subject, and alluded to the increasing predominance of caste power in the native armies, particularly in that of Bengal; but who attended then? Another idea is, that part of every native regiment should be European,—say one flank company or both flank companies, with more English non-commissioned officers. The French mixed natives and Europeans together in this manner with good effect, both as to work in the field and discipline in garrison, and it prevented combination. It has long been the opinion of able men that artillery should be exclusively European, and natives used only as assistants, as I may say, under them; and in this I entirely coincide. It is the artillery only of the mutinous Bengal army which does any execution, and costs us men to recover; and yet the guns have not in general been well fought, and are taken by comparative handfuls of our troops. But I am wearying you, I daresay, with these disquisitions.

The siege-train has reached Delhi, and the final result there cannot be delayed. Every one knows by this time of the munificent aid you are giving us, and the rest is but a work of time. The cold weather is before us, the British army will have the best of the year for field operations, and it is little to say, I think, will perhaps, in the end, be disappointed that there is so little left to do. I myself think there will be comparatively few left in Delhi when it is assaulted, and that our final operations will be in Oudh, where most of the mutineers will fight pro aris et focis, and not for the King of Oudh, or any potentate whatever. It will be satisfactory to you to see how few persons of rank are concerned in this movement, and how few of the people in general, when the millions of which the population of Hindoostan is composed are reckoned. Idle savagery exists everywhere, and the country has never been disarmed. Plunder and violence might be expected from such classes, and it has no doubt abounded, to the misery and disgust of those better classes who were secure under us. I cannot but think that this has had a great effect in our favour throughout the country, and must, too, in the worst districts about Delhi and in Oudh. I trust the complete disarming of the Bengal Presidency will be the first work of the new Government. It has worked well in the Punjaub; and indeed for all India a "licence to carry arms bill" would be very advisable. Oudh must be disarmed, of course. They did not hesitate to disarm the Punjaub almost as the first measure, and we see the benefit of it now; but they dared not attempt to disarm Oudh, because it would have affected the Bengal army, and so it remained as before, strong in itself as having perpetually resisted the Oudh Government, and stronger as being part of ourselves, with which we dare not interfere. It will be broken now and reduced, and with it will be broken all military prestige, and I hope combination, not only of the Brahmins and Rajpoots, but of the petty rajahs and zemindars who abound. In our next revenue settlements, too, we might break up combinations in regard to land, and by seeing that every one gets what he requires for cultivation, make him dependent more upon Government than on his fendal chief. I mistrust those North-West settlements, I assure you, very deeply, and think that had the Government made grants to the people instead of to the middlemen, they would have had more content, more real attachment than in the other course. That course, however, got most money at least cost of collection, and so was persevered in.

I do not go into details of events; those the newspapers chronicle steadily. A few Bengal regiments remain stanch, and do good work, as the 31st at Saugor, &c.; but the rest are gone, and happily, I think, sparing our Government any chance of sympathising with them afterwards. You will know the sad, sad particulars of Cawnpore in time; and I beg you to read the deposition of a soubadar of the Bombay army, who for his faithful conduct has been promoted, with 1000 rupees, and the military order of merit. I dare say, and hope, that there will be many such examples come to light by-and-by. You may hear by this mail that Delhi has been stormed, and Lucknow relieved by Havelock and Outram. If they do not kill the King of Delhi, I hope he will be transported to England with all his family. The King of Oudh should go too, and be kept there, as Dhuleep Singh is, in honour and respect. There should be no flinching in this, I think.

I would not have you think, from anything I have said, that I am against the annexation policy of Lord Dalhousie. The fault was, not guarding it sufficiently; and if, as I believe, it has been the direct means of showing the true temper and worth of the Bengal army, it has been the more welcome now that we are free to remedy it. We should have been hard pressed if this outbreak had occurred when we had the Russian war on our hands. I am delighted to see the question of the Queen's Government openly canvassed; and it should be carried steadily through till Queen Victoria's proclamations are in every village of India belonging to her.

This is a nice little station. Myself, Captain Grant, and his wife, are the only tenants of it. Bullock's house, which he lets me live in, is very comfortable. The situation is on the table-land just above the Ghât, on the south side of the Berar valley, six miles east of a place called Dewul Ghât, which I daresay you will find in any good map. The climate is very good—just now most delightful; and I am quite hearty, and well as ever I was in my life, I am thankful to say. Now good-bye, and God bless you all!—My most affectionate regards and remembrance to all, and believe me ever yours most faithfully,

MEADOWS TAYLOR.

I cannot find my usual statement of revenue and cultivation for this official year, 1856-57, which would have given the details of each department. I only find in a letter to my father, dated June 4, that the net amount of revenue was 919,000 rupees in round numbers, and that the 40,000 rupees lost by abolition of customs duties had been nearly made up.

The increase in cultivation had been very nearly 35,000 acres in the year, which, together with the previous increase, made a total of 219,000 since the cession. 237 miles of road had been completed, and much more had been surveyed, marked out, and was in progress.

The survey showed a result of 260,000 acres completed; and the surveyors, who could not do field-work in the rains, were now occupied in making fair copies of village maps and registries. These maps were most creditably executed, and some of my pupils evinced decided talent as draughtsmen.

I was in daily expectation of a reply in regard to the principles and working of the survey which I had drawn up, and submitted in November 1856; but eight months' work had shown decided and continuous improvement in every respect; and as the tenures of land had not entered into the first propositions, and I had to make many explanations in regard to future contingencies, my final report was delayed. My readers would scarcely understand the minutiae of village and landed tenures, and I will not inflict them upon them here; but I may mention that I found a great proportion of the occupants of land to be mirasdars—that is, persons who hold their portions of land in hereditary occupancy, and had so held it for generations, on a fixed rent. Most of these had suffered from local exactions, and but too many had thrown up their ancestral lands, and had emigrated to the British provinces. Of these great numbers had now returned, and had taken up their former estates where they were in possession of yearly tenants. Others, in cases where the land had been improved, had paid the occupant a sum of money for reoccupaney; but all miras rights were reclaimable within a period of forty years of absence. To preserve the local rights of these miras proprietors, the tenants of miras lands had only been recognised as yearly tenants; but they were not disturbed so long as they paid their rent regularly.

The third was a fluctuating class, who took up lands which generally belonged to the village area, on yearly tenure only. These were constantly changing, and passing from village to village, for the most part unthrifty people, with neither capital nor credit, and but few cattle.

I could see plainly the advantage of settled classes, and of giving them security of tenure, in order to induce the employment of capital and the improvement of their estates; and I proposed that all holders of land should be made proprietors, and that the land should be not only actual property to all, but that it should be allowed to be bought and sold or mortgaged like any other marketable commodity. Also, as the lands in all surveyed villages had now been defined, that the owners and occupants should have the option of taking out title-deeds for them, on stamped paper, which at the head should have a map of the land or estate, whatever it might be, great or small; and that in the body of the deed the boundaries and general description of every field or division should be detailed, the estate to become the hereditary property of the holder, subject only to a lien on the part of Government.

I fixed the term of thirty years for the first settlement of revenue, at the expiration of which period a revision should be made, and the rent fixed as a permanent settlement in perpetuity.

The Bombay survey was admirable, as far as it went, and the occupants of land were secured by registry; but I thought that possession required more security than registry, and that actual title-deeds would provide this, enable the land to be bought and sold, and satisfy the proprietors. I saw, too, that by the plan I proposed the real marketable capital of the country would be enormously increased, and the intrinsic value of the land would become a source of wealth to every individual holder. I also, at the same time as the land survey, carried on a survey of village sites. Every house was numbered, and its boundaries defined and measured, and title-deeds for this description of property were to be given separately.

When all my rules were drawn up and completed, I made a translation of them into Mahratta; and having assembled the chief men of villages, the officers and mirasdars, as well as other landholders and occupants, as many as would attend, I laid before them the paper I had drawn up, telling them what I proposed to do if permitted by Government.

At first anything so definite and so valuable was doubted, and I believe the people, who had all through their lives been under a system of exaction and oppression, thought there was some dark sinister plan lying below the surface; but when they came fully to comprehend the projects laid down, and received my assurance that title-deeds would be given for all lands, even the smallest holdings, the delight (for I can call it nothing else), the enthusiasm, and the gratitude of the people knew no bounds. It seemed to all as if a new life were opening before them—peace for themselves, and their descendants after them.

Two years previous to this, I had saved the people from a measure proposed on the system of the North-West Provinces, by the Supreme Government. This was, to make a settlement of my district, and all the others were placed in the same category, with zemindars. Now there were no zemindars, in the Bengal sense of the term, in the ceded districts, with whom any settlement could be made. The officials who went by that name were the ancient hereditary officers of counties, not necessarily landed proprietors, except in payment of their local services. It was impossible to elevate such persons into landholders, or to give them the rank and position of such, or to transfer to them properties which belonged to other people. Such a course would have interfered seriously with those landed proprietors in villages who were very sturdy in maintaining their hereditary rights; and the settlement in this manner seemed to my perception utterly impossible, and any attempt to force it on the people would have produced not only universal discontent and anger, but in all likelihood a serious insurrection. I wrote, as I was obliged, a great deal on the subject, and I believe I was considered "most impracticable and obstinate," and incurred, I have little doubt, much ill-will; but for that I cared absolutely nothing. I could not uphold what I believed would be an injury and a wrong to my people, or become a party to any course which I considered was not only unjust and unpopular to the last degree, but which would abolish all those ancient hereditary tenures to which the people had clung with devoted pertinacity through all revolutions and vicissitudes for many centuries, and which the old Mussulman kings and rulers of the Deccan had continuously respected.

My view of this question was very strenuously supported by my friend Bullock, Commissioner in Berar; and, in the end, I rejoice to say that we so far prevailed as to enlist the sympathies of our Chief Commissioner on our side, who earnestly protested against the system proposed from Bengal, and was successful in his opposition, inasmuch as the question was deferred for "future consideration." In his Administrative Report of 1870, Mr Saunders, Resident at Hyderabad, and ex-officio Chief Commissioner, states, p. 14:—

"Orders were actually issued by the Government of India for a settlement of rights on the basis of the village community system, and were suspended only in deference to the earnest protest of Mr Maltby, the then Commissioner of the Hyderabad Assigned Districts, some of whose assistants, such as Mr Bullock and Captain Meadows Taylor, had passed their working lives in the Deccan, and perfectly understood the nature and meaning of the facts they had to deal with in their newly-acquired provinces."

Again, after the final territorial arrangements with his Highness the Nizam in 1860 were completed, the question was revived by the Government of India, and orders were again issued in the most stringent terms. All honour is due to Mr Saunders, who, although himself a Bengal civilian, possessed ample means of studying the question from previous reports and local observation, and had the firmness to resist and maintain the existing system; and, as he states, "when the report was drawn up, the final orders of Government were passed, and the system of field assessment and recognised recognition of cultivating occupancy was formally sanctioned."

The people of Berar had also obtained a zealous advocate in Mr Lyall, Commissioner of the province, also a Bengal civilian, whose report, after study of all previous correspondence, formed, perhaps, the basis of those by Mr Saunders, and rescued the rights of the hereditary and all other classes of occupants from transfer to a class of persons who had never possessed them, and who, indeed, made no pretence whatever to them in any way. I had the subject much at heart, and must apologise for this long story about it ; yet I cannot refrain from quoting Mr Lyall's own words, which explain the system on which the new settlement was made in 1869 :—

“The English Government has now placed the tenure of land in Berar on a stable foundation. After some hesitation, for a settlement on the North-West Provinces model was first actually ordered, the Bombay system of survey and settlement according to fields has been adopted. The whole country is being marked off into plots, and assessed at rates which hold good for thirty years. Subject to certain restrictions, the occupant is absolute proprietor of his holding ; may sell, let, or mortgage any part of it, cultivate it, or leave it waste, so long as he pays its assessment, which is fixed for the term of thirty years, and may then be raised only on general principles ; that is, the assessment of an entire district or village may be raised or lowered as may be expedient ; but the impost may not be altered to the detriment of any one occupant on account of his improvements. . . . When the registered holder alienates his estate, he does it by surrender and admittance, like in English copyholding. Indeed the Berar occupancy has many features resembling the copyhold estate in the reservation of manorial rights. Thus, in fifteen years, the Berar cultivator has passed from all evils of rack-renting, personal insecurity, and uncertain ownership of land, to a safe property and a fixed assessment."

All this is in exact accordance with the plans laid down by me in 1856 as the principle of my own survey of the province of Nuldroog; but in my humble opinion it does not go far enough. It neither gives title-deeds for the land, nor does it assure the landholder that after the expiration of the thirty years' assessment any further adjustment of rates shall be final and unchangeable in perpetuity. Possibly the grant of title-deeds may be deferred only till the present term of thirty years has expired; but I rejoice to see that a perpetual settlement with all bonâ fide proprietors of land throughout India is now publicly advocated, if not publicly notified; and I trust the bill to be passed on the subject will include the issue of title-deeds. I cannot imagine a more beneficial or more popular measure, or one more calculated to secure the gratitude of the agricultural classes of India. These deeds would be issued by millions, and the property in land would be an enormous addition to the national wealth of India.

I feel that this digression may have been wearisome to some of my readers, but in writing the 'Story of my Life' I cannot pass this over without notice, as it was a point on which, firmly believing myself to be in the right, I deliberately risked not only the goodwill of the Government of India at that time, but my own employment as Deputy-Commissioner. I would never have agreed to carry out the unjust measure proposed in ignorance of local tenures by the Government of India, and my friend Bullock and myself were prepared to have resigned our appointments in case stringent orders were issued on the subject; and there is no act of my public life which, to this day, gives me more sincere pleasure and satisfaction than my successful resistance to the orders of Government to the settlement being made according to the North-West system.

It was hoped the Mutiny would be confined to Bengal; but very early in June the regiment of cavalry stationed at Aurungabad, or a portion of it, was decidedly in a mutinous condition, and was, perhaps, only checked by the attitude of the infantry and artillery who were loyal. Application had been made to Ahmednugger for assistance, and the General marched at once upon Aurungabad with part of a dragoon regiment and some horse-artillery. Hearing of their approach, some of the native cavalry broke away at once, and proceeded to Hyderabad and Hominabad, exciting much alarm throughout the country. The dread was great lest the whole Contingent might be infected with the spirit of the army of Bengal, for most of the Contingent infantry were from Oudh, and thus their example might have spread to the Madras army ; happily, however, —most happily and providentially—the Contingent remained otherwise firm.

The re-establishment of a new empire at Delhi would not at all have suited the Nizam ; for his ancestors had declared themselves independent when the empire had fallen into decadence. And this consideration alone, had others been wanting, would have preserved his loyalty.

It was impossible not to feel great anxiety at Nuldroog. After the mutiny among the cavalry was known abroad, and, I think, when the mutineers arrived at Hominabad, they must have had some communication with those who were with me. They seemed uneasy for several days, and the native officer who was in command seemed uneasy too ; but the men professed entire loyalty when I went among them ; and as they were quartered in the town, they could not do much harm to any one. They were watched carefully by the police. Eventually three of the troopers broke away at night and went towards Hominabad—the rest remained at their post. I had no means of pursuing the fugitives, indeed my doing so would not have answered any good purpose ; and even supposing the cavalry had come to Nuldroog, on account of its treasury, and attacked it, as it was reported they intended to do, I had ample garrison inside the fort, in police and infantry, to have repelled them. The great gate was the only mode of communication with the interior, and the approaches on all other sides were defended by inaccessible precipices. Sholapoor, too, where the troops were quite loyal, lay within twenty-six miles of us, and a reinforcement could be obtained in twenty-four hours at any time if needed ; but the stout old fort no doubt induced a feeling of security which might not have been felt in less well-defended quarters.

On the 23d July, I was very agreeably surprised by a letter from the Chief Commissioner, Mr Maltby, informing me that I had been nominated “settlement officer” and “surveyor-in-chief” to all four districts of the cession, on a salary of 1500 rupees a-month for the present, and 300 rupees travelling allowance. All my maps and proposed plans of settlement had been approved and confirmed, and I was to set about collecting an establishment as soon as possible, so as to begin my work directly the monsoon admitted of my so doing. This was indeed good news; and I looked anxiously to the time when I could surrender all revenue affairs to a successor, who I hoped would be Cadell, as he knew the district and the people so well, and all were attached to him. My new duties would be infinitely more congenial and agreeable ones to me, I felt; and to get rid of the interminable details of revenue business would be a very great relief. I was in high spirits at the prospect opening before me, and at the thought that all my labour at the commencement of the survey would now bear good fruit for the people and save me much trouble. Mine was, however, "the only district in which any attempt had been made to carry out the orders of Government, and my proceedings, from first to last, had been eminently successful, and reflected the highest credit upon me." So wrote Mr Maltby; and I was very much gratified at his kind expressions.

I was quite easy about my district in every respect. The revenue would increase up to two lakhs, which would be its maximum, till the conclusion of the survey; and in all other respects everything was progressing steadily and well. There had not been a single case of dacoity for upwards of a year now!

But I was doomed to disappointment, and all my pleasant dreams rudely dispelled, at least for the present, by the receipt of an express from the Chief Commissioner, on the 24th August, informing me that I had been appointed Deputy-Commissioner of Berar, vice Bullock, who was transferred to my district; and I was to proceed there with all possible speed.

With this public notification came private letters from the Resident and Mr Maltby, both to say that my immediate transfer was a necessity—but why, they did not tell me. Their letters urged me to make no delay whatever, and the Resident's note was characteristic:—

“Go to Berar directly, and hold on by your eyelids. I have no troops to give you, and you must do the best you can. I know I can depend upon you; and I am sure you will not fail me.”

I would have started that very day, but my camels were out grazing in the country, and Temple was absent, to whom I must make over the treasury and all current business. What would come of the survey now I knew not, nor of my appointment as "settlement officer." I saw the call was very urgent. It was not a time to waste words or thought in idle speculations. My duty was clear before me, and the times were too exciting to venture to ask any questions. I was, however, assured that I should be promoted to be a Deputy-Commissioner of the first class on a salary of 1500 rupees a-month.

It became known later that the survey operations had been suspended till more peaceful times, and all public works as well—till the present threatening aspect of affairs was at an end.

On the day appointed for me to leave—the 27th August—I was presented with a public address from all the official and principal persons of the province. This ultimately received 1622 signatures, and I append a translation of it here. I had not the least conception that such a proceeding had ever been intended. The address was beautifully written in Mahratta, and presented to me on a very handsome silver salver, which I now use constantly.

True Translation of a Mahratta Address to Captain Meadows Taylor, Deputy-Commissioner, Daraseo District, August 27, 1857.

(After the usual preliminary compliments.)

“ Since your arrival in this country we have all been happy and prosperous. Now an order has come from Government that you are to go to Berar, and Government has no doubt directed this because of your qualifications, and fitness, and ability for that duty. As it is a higher office than this, it will be a source of pleasure to you; and we all pray to God that He will be pleased to protect so kind and merciful an officer, and we shall be very grateful, so God will hear our prayers.

“ But now we are to be separated from you, and are thereby fallen into a sea of grief. We shall never be able to give sufficient praise to you for the manner in which you have protected the people hitherto—how you have created means of prosperity—and for your various good qualities. Still we have it in our hearts to address you in some sort, and you are to be pleased to accept it in order to gratify all.

“ In the year 1853 you came to this district as Deputy-Commissioner; and, considering its circumstances then and now, there is a very great difference in its condition, of which you are the sole cause. When you came, there were no good roads in Nuldroog; all the village streets and paths were filthy and useless, and even men travelled with difficulty. But you, with much personal exertion, have made proper arrangements for the good comfort of all. We all know this, and it has all come of your kindness.

“There was an immense quantity of waste land in the district. This has been cultivated since you came, and is now inhabited; and by provision of water and other circumstances in the country, hamlets, villages, and market-towns have been founded and built, and trade has very greatly increased, by which all obtain a livelihood, and there is no distress of any kind.

“Before, in this district, dacoits and gang-robbers and plunderers who openly committed murder, used to go about in force, and the inhabitants were much afflicted by them. But you established police, and settled everything, and so entirely extirpated these people, that not even a trace of them remains. From this protection of life and property, one of the principal benefits which result from the British Government was secured to this district.

“In the year 1855 there was a very heavy famine in this land, and it was difficult even for rich people to support themselves. In that hard time many poor people were at the point of death; many could get no food, and in their straits even abandoned their children. We all saw this. Then you made great exertions to save these poor people, and began with large establishments to clear the fort, and to make roads—as well to the advantage of Government as to the people; and thus you maintained the poor, who had no other means of subsistence. Of those who were not able to labour, you, from your own private funds, supported thousands. So if we seek for benevolent and useful people like you, we find few of them.

“From the tanks which you strove to get constructed, this district will be greatly benefited, and from this your name will be sung with praise when our women grind at their mills. But if we now say all we have to say it would only fatigue you, and take up much time; therefore we will be concise, and close this with what is due to your good qualities.

“But what shall we say? You were as father and mother to the ryots. You heard the complaints of the poor and protected them. In your darbar, as flies to honey, all classes and degrees of persons gathered and mingled together without apprehension; but we never saw yet that you ever used harsh expressions to any one. Your perfect knowledge of our language assured complainants, for they knew they were understood, and were contented; and never, on any occasion, have we seen that any one was treated with indignity or affronted in your darbar.

“We, who are the servants of Government in this district, as also all the ryots, well know what your conduct has been, and know also that your kindness to us has never decreased. You have taken care of us as of our children. Were we to relate how you have exerted yourself for us, we should never make an end of it. It will be difficult for us to obtain another superior like you, and we considered it good fortune when we obtained service with you. Now you are going from us, and our misfortune is apparent to us. Be it so. Wherever you go, may God prosper you, and may our country be prosperous through you. So we entreat God. Our hearts are full, and we can say no more. So also, before you came here you were at Shorapoor, and there, too, you made all happy, and made that district prosperous. Such praise have we heard from many persons who came from thence.

“Now our last request is this, that as you have bestowed on us so many obligations and so much love upon us, we, to show our gratitude to you, have signed this address, which all assembled have agreed on, and we pray you will be pleased to accept it. This is our unanimous representation, which you are to be pleased to accede to.

(Signed) “JEWUNJEE RUTTONJEE, SHUNKUR RAO RUGGONATH,
Extra-Assistant Commissioners;

(Dated Nuldroog, Aug. 27, 1857.)

I can never forget the scene in the public cucherry when this was read to me. My old friend Shunkur Rao Baba Sahib, read it with the tears running down his cheeks, and there were few dry eyes among the vast crowd that had collected. The old cry, “Mahadeo Baba Ke Jey!” was raised outside and taken up by thousands. It was the first time I had heard it at Nuldroog. I was much moved. Nothing, I thought, could exceed this simple but earnest expression of the feelings of the people towards me, and their manifestation of regard and affection was very grateful to my heart; and if I had stood between the people and wrong in the matter of land—if I had governed them justly to the best of my ability—if I had insured for them peace, and laid the foundation of prosperity, this was indeed a grateful reward—all I could have hoped or wished for on earth.

That night as I left the fort and town, I found all the road and street lined with the people, cheering me with the old shout, "Mahadco Baba Kc Jey!" and many were weeping, and pressing round to bid farewell; and I was followed for more than two miles out of the town with the same cheer, by a crowd from which it seemed difficult to get away. रामेव नयते

At every village I passed through that night, and till my frontier was reached, the village authorities, elders, and people came with their farewells and best wishes, in crowds, from all points within their reach, praying for my speedy and safe return. My departure from Shorapoor had been affecting and painful to me, but the demeanour of the people here was, if possible, more touching and affectionate.

CHAPTER XIV.

I ARRIVED at Jaulnah on the ninth day. I had intended to travel faster, but a feverish cold I caught on leaving Nuldroog, when my palan-keen doors were open and a chill night wind blowing through them, confined me to my bed for one whole day and night, and retarded my progress, so that I could not make double marches. The warm greetings and farewells did not cease till I reached the city of Beer in the Nizam's dominions,—everywhere the same reception, most hearty and affectionate.

The native district officer at Beer, on behalf of the Nizam's Government, came out to meet me with a large retinue, a distance of six miles ; and I found my tents pitched in a very pleasant garden close to the city, and a most ample breakfast cooked at the officer's house, and ready to place upon my table. He pressed me very much to stay as long as I could, but I dared not linger; and in the afternoon I pushed on again to a village on the Hyderabad road, where there was a good bungalow.

Next day I had to cross the Godavery at Shahgurrh; fortunately it was not in high flood, but it was not fordable. Here I found all my camels, baggage-ponies, and servants, clustered together on the bank of the river—the ferrymen would not permit them to pass; and as soon as I came up there were some very ominous cries of Deen! Deen!* while the ferrymen, who had taken their boat to some distance, waved me off. I had no escort—only four men out of twenty-four who had been sent with me from Beer; the other sixteen had already crossed the river. I had not brought my own cavalry escort from Nuldroog; some of them still appeared very restless, and I thought it was safer to leave them where they were. As I and my servants were parleying with the boatmen, an old Byragee whom I had never seen before, raised the old cry loudly: “Mahadeo Baba Ke Jey!” he shouted—and many joined, drowning the Deen! Deen! most completely; while on the opposite side of the river, near the town of

* “For the Faith!” the Mohammedan call to arms.

Shahgurh, a large body of cavalry came in view, making it very doubtful to my mind what would be the next move. This, however, was soon decided by one of the horsemen, the officer in command of the party, tying a white scarf to his spear, and at the same time despatching two other boats with a few dismounted men to my assistance. On seeing this, the party who had set up the cry of Deen ! Deen ! bolted up the bank, looking sulky enough, and I saw them no more ; while the three boats took me, my bearers, servants, baggage, and camels, across the river in safety.

The horsemen had been sent by an old friend of mine, the Talookdar of Umber, with orders to see me safe over the river. He did not expect me so soon, or he would have sent them before. He had heard that the Mussulmans of Shahgurh had betrayed a very fanatical spirit, and had said I was not to be allowed to proceed ; and he feared for my safety.

This escort would not permit me to halt at Shahgurh, but carried me on to a village eight miles further, where they had ordered a small tent to be pitched for me, and there I slept. Next morning we all went on to Umber. My old friend was ill and could not leave his house ; but he sent his son with a large cavalcade to meet me, and entertained me most hospitably all day.

My friend, who was able to visit me in the evening, told me that he feared several mutineers of the Aurungabad cavalry were concealed at Shahgurb, and that a Mussulman priest had been preaching rebellious addresses; but that he should send fifty men to the crossing place for the protection of travellers. I left the escort here that had accompanied me from Beer. The men were sadly vexed at the scene at the river, and that they had not been with me; but as we could not all have crossed together, I, anticipating no difficulty, had desired them to precede me. I now dismissed them with a letter to the Talookdar of Beer, thanking him for their services.

Next day I marched twenty miles, and arrived at Jaulnah. I was rather amused at the "cloud of cavalry" sent to attend me by my old friend, whose only regret was that he was not well enough to accompany me himself. Orders had been forwarded to a Parsee merchant at Jaulnah to see that a house was ready for me; and as the cantonment was nearly emptied of troops, there were plenty at my disposal, and I found myself located in a very comfortable well-furnished bungalow belonging to the Colonel of the 6th

Cavalry. Here Major Gill, who had been for some years employed by Government in copying the Buddhist frescoes in the caves of Ajunta, came to see me, and gave me a letter from Bullock, which had come in by express, begging me to wait for him at Jaulnah, which I was glad to do, especially as a heavy fall of rain set in, and marching would have been next to impracticable. Two days afterwards my friend joined me, and told me what had occurred. On the outbreak of the Mutiny several of his cavalry escort had broken away, very much as mine had done, and the whole district was reported to be unsound. He had asked for troops, which it was impossible to send him; and after a very sharp correspondence on both sides, our sudden exchange of districts was peremptorily ordered. I had been told nothing of this, but had simply acted according to the short urgent letter I had received; but the prospect of having to keep Berar quiet after what I now heard, was not encouraging by any means.

I was likewise told that I must be prepared to find the internal economy of the district very irregular. When Bullock had gone on furlough to England, his successor had not carried out the general instructions promptly, and I should find the progress made slow, but he hoped I would soon set things all right; he had begun to work hard on his return, and thought he had put matters in training. I told him he would not have much trouble with my district, as it was in capital working order; and so we parted. This was no time to show vacillation or uneasiness, and I was determined to go through the country and among the people exactly as I should have done had I heard no unpleasant rumours. There were no troops to be had, so there was no use thinking about them. As much of the Contingent as could be spared, and several half-mutinous regiments of cavalry and infantry, were collected at Edlabad, near Boorhanpoor, and prepared for service with (then) Sir Hugh Rose's force; and for the time, no bolder course could have been adopted. Nevertheless, the Resident was assailed fiercely by the press; accused of shifting the responsibility of managing mutinous troops on others, and of ruining the chances of Sir Hugh Rose's success by placing in his rear a large brigade of the best troops in India, who could not possibly be depended on. But Colonel Davidson knew his men. He issued a spirited address to them, appealing to their loyalty, and encouraging them to go forward and win fame under Sir

Hugh Rose. The men obeyed ; and after the brigade joined Sir Hugh, it shared in the whole of the Central India campaign with him, and behaved well to the very last. Colonel Davidson had in view a much higher aim than merely keeping the troops employed in the field. His object was to show that the Nizam had no sympathy with the re-establishment of the monarchy of Delhi ; and that his own troops were assisting the English to quell the Mutiny, and crush the authors of it ; and in this point the Resident's bold measure was successful beyond his hopes.

On the 19th July, the Residency at Hyderabad was attacked by a concourse of Rohillas and other city fanatics, who were easily repulsed ; but the Resident was at issue with the Commander of the Hyderabad Subsidiary Force, who not only differed from him on the question of retaining the Residency at all as a fortified post, but advised its total abandonment, and the location of all belonging to it within the cantonment. Happily the Resident took his own way, and he saw clearly that his desertion of the Residency would have the effect of weakening the Minister (now Sir Salar Jung, G.C.S.I.), and also the Nizam himself, both of whose lives had been threatened by fanatics. It was when it was determined that the Contingent Force should take the field, that my friend had applied for troops, and the utter impracticability of the request was resented. "Berar," wrote the Resident to me, "which contains more than two millions of people, must be kept quiet by moral strength, for no physical force is at my disposal."

Delhi, attacked first in June, and before which a position only was maintained till the siege began on the 1st September, was taken by storm on the 14th, but resistance continued inside until the 20th. Every native in India who could think at all, had watched the progress of the siege from June to September with the greatest anxiety as to which would win the victory—England or the Moghul; and many doubted whether the small force of English in India could make any impression on the immense power of the native army of Bengal. And the long delay, to which they were so little accustomed in English operations generally, strengthened this feeling considerably.

As I approached the head station of Berar, Booldana, I received deputations from the principal landholders, merchants, and bankers of the chief towns, who were all eager for authentic news; but I could discover no symptom whatever of disaffection. The great Mussulman colony below the plateau of Booldana had been one of the chief points of anxiety to my predecessor; and, as soon as I could, I marched there, sending down a light tent before me. I gave no other warning, and was quite unexpected by the native officials and my English assistant, whom I found in charge. Though my sudden appearance at the head town of their county, when I had as yet visited no other, at first excited some surprise, and perhaps suspicion, we soon became excellent friends. At first I felt rather doubtful, as nobody came near me, and my servants heard very disagreeable rumours; but at length one leading man came forward, then another, and another, I suppose, to take my measure; and then all the people came, many hundreds, and raising the old cry, "Bolo Mahadeo Baba Ke Jey!" which some one set up, the whole assembly joined in heartily, and proffered service whenever and however I needed them. "They would watch the frontier," they said; "they would not let in Scindia's disaffected people; they would follow me to Delhi if I would only take them there; they wanted no pay—only food, and ammunition for their matchlocks; they would be true and faithful to the English,"— and many more promises were made, and faithfully kept.

From that day they never gave me the least uneasiness; and, if I had had occasion to call them out, would, I firmly believe, have done their duty nobly.

I wrote what had occurred, privately, to the Resident, by express, and I believe my despatch was a very considerable relief to him, as he was under great anxiety about Berar.

I need say nothing upon the condition of the internal economy of Berar at this time. Cultivation and revenue alike seemed to have declined, and did not exhibit the elasticity of Nuldroog. I had to set things to rights as much as I could, and the Commissioner wrote that he would come to me in January. Very hard work fell on me, as my assistants were new to the duties, and had not been trained to a regular system, which, had it been adopted from the first, would have rendered matters easy now to all. There was, too, a heavy arrear of appeals and civil suits; but every allowance was to be made, for the territory had undergone so many changes from one hand to another; and my friend Bullock's health having failed, and his being obliged to take furlough just after his appointment, had not given the district a fair chance. The climate was very enervating, and the district so extensive, that I felt very thankful my first appointment to it had been altered for Nuldroog, as I am quite sure my health would never have held out under its relaxing influence. Indeed I felt anxious now as to whether I should be able to stand it; but this only experience would prove.

Booldana was a pleasant place on the south table-land, above the valley of Berar, and had been fixed upon as the head station on account of its fine climate; for there was the greatest possible difference in the air up there and that in the valley below. The views were beautiful down the wooded ravines, and my early morning rides were far more picturesque than any about Nuldroog. But I had no time to stay there long, and, after a few days' rest, I took my establishment into the valley, and began work in earnest. It was not by any means pleasant, as I was obliged to find much fault with the managers of divisions, who, being provided with ample instructions, had neglected to carry them out, and had neither kept their own accounts in order, nor those of the villages under them. Neither were the village books nor the records properly kept. These were matters of detail, as to which

I need not perplex my readers, for, except at great length, they could not be explained intelligibly; and if they were, it would not answer any purpose.

I confess I thought I had been badly paid at Nuldroog, having received 300 rupees a-month less than had been granted to the Deputy-Commissioner in Berar, solely because the latter had a higher revenue and population: the area of both were nearly similar. However, it was no use grumbling now. I had done the work at Nuldroog to the best of my ability, and now I was going to try to set things straight here, and I hoped to get the district rapidly into order. As yet I had received no additional pay. I, as second-class Deputy-Commissioner, was holding a first-class district; Bullock, as first-class Deputy-Commissioner, holding a second-class district. But we supposed some arrangement would be come to in time.

Although both Delhi and Lucknow had been taken, yet the pacification of the country was far from complete; and rebellion in the Central Provinces, close to my own northern frontier, had made, and was making, rapid progress.

There was now much more alarm and uneasiness than before the taking of Delhi, which was far too distant from us to excite more than passing interest.

I received many anonymous letters, apparently from friends, warning me of contemplated assassination, and stating that when I was disposed of, the native troops at Ellichpoor were prepared to rise, and, aided by the military and predatory classes of the district, would plunder the chief towns, and join the rebel forces beyond the Sâtpoorâ range which constituted my whole northern frontier. At Nimawa, Captain Keatinge had been obliged to conceal himself in the jungle, having his wife and children with him; and they escaped almost by a miracle.

At Jubbulpore and Saugor, rebellion was at its height, not only in the mutiny of native regiments, but by the risings of petty rajahs and nawabs, and of the people of the district, always noted for their turbulent and predatory habits.

There was hardly one spot where loyalty prevailed; for as the regiments broke away from their several stations, with or without violence and murder, as it might be, all restraint was removed from the lawless classes of the people at large, and these were every day growing stronger under the evil spirit and licence which could not be checked.

On the eastern portion of Berar lay Nagpore, by no means to be trusted ; and it was owing to the large force of faithful Madras troops who were stationed there that no serious outbreak occurred in favour of the deposed family, on whose behalf, it was reported, intrigue was busy throughout the whole country. On my western frontier lay Khandeish, not secure either. Nana Sahib had active agents there, as he aspired to be Peshwah ; and all the northern frontier of that province was in contact with Scindia's and Holkar's territories, where rebellion was rife.

Berar was the centre of these three great provinces, which stretched across the whole of India, and formed, as it were, the barriers that were to prevent the rebellion from spreading southwards ; and of the three, Berar was the most important perhaps, as, if the rebels had broken through the passes of the Sâtpoor range—a very easy proceeding—and had been joined by the military classes and indigenous marauders of the province, it is impossible to say how far disaffection might have extended to the Nizam's dominions.

From October, therefore, as the circle of war and mutiny grew wider, reaching my northern frontier, the danger increased almost daily ; and it was only the thorough attachment and loyalty of the people to the English rule which saved Berar, under God's blessing, from insurrection.

I have already mentioned the goodwill and proffered devotion of the Mussulmans of the western portions of my district; and as I travelled up the valley slowly to Akola, I was equally gratified by the conduct of the Rajpoots, who resided there in large numbers. There had been fierce and bloody feuds between these two great classes from time to time, on occasions of religious festivals; and this seemed a good opportunity for them to break out again; for I had literally no troops on whom I could rely, and those at Ellichpore were more a source of uneasiness to me than anything else, as, although they were as yet orderly and quiet, it was felt that any excitement might cause them to break off and join their rebel brethren at Jubbulpore or in Central India. Their officers were very mistrustful of them, for many were from Oudh; and who could rely on them after the mutiny of Scindia's troops and their march to join the main body of the rebel forces?

I was grateful for the attachment evinced by the Rajpoots of the Akola district, who also proffered service wherever and whenever it might be of use. All I could do was to ask their aid in watching the passes, and in apprehending parties from the north who might seek to sow rebellion among us. This they promised to do; and in two instances they actually did so, succeeding in arresting and bringing to justice a number of delegates from Scindia's mutinous troops at Boorhanpoor, whom I tried and sentenced to transportation and penal servitude. And these events prevented any further attempt of the like nature.

There were several petty rajahs of the mountain tribes of Gonds who received hereditary allowances or stipends from the Berar administrators, and who were responsible for the several passes which led from the north. All these came to me and tendered their services, nor did any one case occur of disloyalty or neglect.

The northern frontier was thus made as secure as I could under these circumstances make it; but, in Colonel Davidson's expressive phrase, I was literally "holding on by my eyelids."

I will not deny that it was a period of fearful anxiety. No aid could be expected from without, and the anonymous warnings were more frequent than ever, while evil reports flew daily through the country. My servants kept a horse saddled for me every night in case of necessity for escape.

I had no guards except a few police, and I was carrying on my duties in my tents as usual : making the yearly settlement ; examining village books, district books, and accounts ; trying appeal and civil cases ; holding criminal trials, and the like. One great benefit to me was my being able to speak the vernacular language, Mahratta, fluently. The people felt that I understood them, and came to me freely with petitions as to any real or imaginary grievance.

There had been some corruption at work among my chuprassies or office attendants, which seemed to be of long standing ; and I one night overheard a conversation between two of them who lay outside my tent walls, when they thought I was asleep, about division of the proceeds of their gains, upon the receipt of petitions, which would have been amusing enough but for the mischief that such extortion for presenting petitions to me occasioned. I at once adopted my Nuldroog plan, which was to have a large box fitted with hinges and a padlock : a slit was cut in the lid, and notification made that all petitions henceforth were to be dropped into it, and that petitioners were to attend every afternoon, when the box would be opened before me, and the papers publicly read. The box was placed in an open space before my tent, and was presently filled with petitions ; the two men, whose confidential talk I had overheard, were then called up. I took my usual seat outside my tent, and after addressing the crowd, I had the men's badges removed, and they were turned out of camp in disgrace.

I think, nay, I am positive, that if every Deputy-Commissioner, situated as I was, had such a box, they would find it an admirable plan. It had an excellent effect in my district, and inspired great confidence among the people. Any frivolous complaint was at once dismissed ; but many corrupt practices and grievances were brought to light ; and as each petition was taken out of the box, the name of the petitioner was called out, and every applicant knew that his paper was considered, and heard it read before me. A memorandum was then written on the back, referring it to the district native officer for report if necessary.

I was now fairly among the people ; and though so often cautioned and advised of danger, I felt that reliance on them was the safest course. Once, in a Bombay paper, it was stated that I had been attacked and murdered ; but I wrote to contradict the report before the departure of the mail for England, and the dear ones at home knew nothing of it ; nor did I, as I see by my letters home, mention any current reports, and, indeed, I alluded very little to the condition of affairs at all, or my own cares. I lived, however, in a state of perpetual alarm, and every day added to the anxiety I endured. Every detail of deeds of violence in Central India—of which, almost daily, fresh rumours reached me, sometimes very much exaggerated—the arrival of every “express,” night or day, in camp—caused unavoidable excitement. Who could say what news it might not bring ? At that time all Deputy-Commissioners of provinces and political officers used to send such expresses, when and how they could, to each other, giving local news, and with a request that the express might be forwarded to the next authority. Many a man in India was “holding on,” never flinching from his post, dying there bravely in many a terrible instance, or, when hope was gone, escaping with bare life, often through hosts of enemies, and thankful for that mercy. “What if Bera should go ?” I often thought ; and how could I hope to escape ? How thankful I was that I was alone—that I had only myself to think of ! Had I had wife and children with me, as many had, my anxiety would have been increased a thousandfold.

True, my people appeared steady and trustworthy, and business proceeded as usual, as I moved my camp from village to village; but Berar was 250 miles long, with an average breadth of 60 miles or more, and the population was two millions. Who could answer for all? And from day to day for some months, one felt as if in the morning one might be murdered before night, or at night be dead before the morning.

The Resident's anxiety on my account seemed to increase; but I assured him in my letters, which were rare, that so far I could not trace any disaffection, and that a good spirit seemed to prevail among the people, even where I had felt most uneasiness myself. Still I often longed to be in the roughest scenes in Central India rather than bear the load of responsibility on my mind day and night: it was a terrible strain upon me.

I was at Ellichpoor on the 9th December, and I stayed there till the 13th. It was very cold, the thermometer showing 36° and 40° in the mornings. It was the head civil station of a subdivision of my district, and I was greatly indebted to Captain Hamilton, who superintended it, for his watchful supervision of the frontier. The people were deeply attached to him, and gave him information freely. How welcome were the large baskets of delicious peaches grown in his garden at Chiculda, the sanitarium of Ellichpoor! and I wished I could go up there again and revisit the old scenes.

The native officers of the cavalry and infantry both visited me, and I congratulated them on the honours which their regiments were winning in Central India. They appeared to be intensely gratified at the news which reached them from time to time, both in newspapers and private letters, and at the prospect which was opening for further good service under Sir Hugh Rose, whose forces were now advancing into the disturbed districts.

Many of the men also came to me "for a talk," and raised the old cry of my regiment, which was known to all. So I hoped the disaffection of the cavalry at Ellichpoor was a groundless rumour.

When the glorious news came from the Northern Provinces, the victory over the Gwalior troops at Cawnpore, and the second relief of Lucknow, with many other successful engagements in Central India, the year 1858 opened very brightly, and with good hope that the general campaign against the rebel forces would be brought to a brilliant conclusion in a few months. Already the various combinations of the rebel army and the various rebel chiefs had been much broken ; now they were growing dispirited, and had nothing to fall back upon. When the constant arrival of troops from home made it manifest to all that England was fully roused, and was putting forth her strength and her enormous resources to save and help her sons, the hopes of the rebel leaders fell, and they felt their inability to war against her.

I am not, however, writing a history of the time,—that is in far abler hands than mine. I can only relate what affected me personally.

My own position was decided by the Governor-General, who decreed, as I thought he would, that my friend was to be reinstated in Berar, and I to return to my old quarters—Nuldroog. The Commissioner, Mr Maltby, had been at Nuldroog, had seen all my work, and approved of it, and had been much struck by the independent, though thoroughly respectful, demeanour of my Mahratta farmers. They had visited him freely, and assured him of their prosperity and loyalty, and he wrote me a very flattering letter on the condition of the district generally. In Berar I had done my utmost to redeem irregularities and reconcile conflicting accounts ; but three months had been too short a time to do all I wished, or to leave things as straight as I should have liked.

Bullock was to leave Nuldroog at once, and wished me to meet him in the eastern portion of the district as soon as I could ; and I too was anxious to get back to my old work before the very hot weather began. Berar was beginning to tell upon me ; the old fever had returned in periodical attacks, and I was tormented with severe neuralgia, from which I could obtain no relief whatever. I had used the hot springs at Salbudlee with some good effect, but it was not lasting, and I greatly dreaded the hot season. All the accounts had been sent in, and I found that one lakh out of two, set down for remission, was recoverable : the village books were now in order, and only careful supervision was needed.

While in the eastern portion of the district, I had been able to perform an essential service to Government, which had great effect on the war in Central India. One day I received an express from Colonel Hill, Assistant Quartermaster-General of the Madras army, attached to General Whitlock's force at Nagpore, which had not marched, and was not able to do so, for want of draught and carriage bullocks. He requested I would, if possible, purchase and send to him 600 at once, leaving 400 more to follow; and added, if I could not manage this, there would be no hope of getting any except from Mysore. The Nagpore province either would not, or could not, supply them. I set to work directly. The province of Berar contains the finest draught cattle in India, and plenty were to be had at moderate prices. No sooner were my wants known than my camp was crowded with noble beasts. In two days I had got half the number, which were sent on under an escort of police, and day after day other herds were despatched; and this enabled the siege-train and heavy stores to be sent on without delay, so that eventually the whole force was set in motion, with an ample supply of trained cattle.

I received not only the thanks of the generals commanding for this assistance, but of the Governor of Madras in Council; and it was very clear that, if these cattle had not been sent up from the south, Whitlock's force could not have accomplished what it did in marching upon Jubbulpore, and, by a lucky stroke, capturing the Kirwee treasures. I thought myself fairly entitled to a share of the Kirwee booty for the service I had rendered; but it was decreed afterwards by Sir J. Phillimore, that as I did not belong to the force, " my chance, though just in equity, was not admissible."

In my letters home at this period I wrote very earnestly on the question of pressing the direct rule of the Crown in the future government of India, and that the time had arrived for a change to be made with advantage.

There was a very general impression that the great Company was only a farmer of the revenues; and while royal houses would acknowledge and respect the Crown, they would have, especially after late events, no such feeling for the Company.

I suggested many other material changes as to high courts of justice and tenures of land, several of which have been carried out; and I had the honour done me of some of my letters being read in the " House."

The letters written to my cousin Reeve, and already given, embody most of my opinions and suggestions.

Strange indeed was the weird prophecy of Plassey in 1757-58 !

The Company's rule was to last for a hundred years. In 1857-58 it had virtually expired, and 1859 witnessed its total extinction !

It was my intention, after leaving my friend, to go direct vid Aurungabad to Beer. Mr Maltby was now on his way to Berar, and Bullock and I moved on to meet him early in February, when he asked me to accompany him through the district, and to visit with him the caves of Ajunta and Ellora. This would have been a very pleasant holiday for me ; but again I was to be disappointed. We met the Commissioner near Oomrawuttee, on his way to Elliehpoor, and the very next day came an "express" from the Resident, directing me to lose not a moment in proceeding to Hyderabad on business relating to Shorapoor.

I had seen by the papers a short time before, that the Rajah had been suspected of treason, and that troops had been sent to watch the eastern and western frontiers of his district. Now I learned that he had attacked a small force which had been ordered to Captain Campbell's assistance—this officer having been sent to Shorapoor on a special mission ; and the Rajah being defeated, had fled to Hyderabad, where he had been arrested.

Mr Maltby spoke very kindly to me of all he had noted in the Nuldroog district, and hoped I should soon be again at liberty to continue my work there, especially the survey operations. I ventured to ask whether I might be allowed anything for my labours in Berar ; but he could not say—and my travelling expenses had been a very serious pull upon my resources. I was to receive plenty of thanks ; but although these were very gratifying, they did not pay me for the very hard work and terrible anxiety I had gone through : but—there was one comfort—I had “ held on by my eyelids ! ”

I pushed on now by double marches to Hingolee, and thence to Hyderabad, where I arrived on the 18th March, after having travelled 300 miles in sixteen days—not very fast perhaps ; but my continued travelling had blistered my people’s feet, and I could not get on quicker.

I went of course to Mr Palmer’s house, and found him well and cheerful ; but the Resident would not hear of my being with any one but himself, and sent for me directly. I was very kindly received. He at once increased my pay, appointed me now Commissioner of Shorapoor, on 1800 rupees a-month, or, at the least, 1500, and said his wish was to keep me altogether in the political department.

He told me all the high officials, and chiefly the Governor-General, were more than satisfied with what I had done in Berar.

CHAPTER XV.

THE Rajah of Shorapoor was a prisoner in the main-guard of the "Royals" at Secunderabad, and I went three times to see him. He had deliberately rebelled against the British Government, and was to be tried for his life by a military commission, which would shortly assemble. As may be imagined, he was deeply affected on first seeing me, and he threw himself into my arms, quite unable to speak for some time. Even the honest fellows of the guard were moved, and much surprised that my appearance should have so sudden and extraordinary an effect upon their prisoner. In appearance he was much improved—he had grown stouter, fairer, and more manly; but though handsome, his features bore unmistakable signs of dissipation and excess, which I was sorry to see. Now, his face was so distorted with his emotions that it was difficult to judge what it would be in repose.

"O appa, appa!" was all he could cry, or rather moan, as he sat at my feet, his face buried in my lap, and his arms clasped tightly around me; "O appa, I dare not look on your face! I have been so wicked—oh, so wicked! I have done every crime—I have even committed murder! Oh, if the earth had opened, and swallowed me up, it would only have been just. I cannot tell you all now, appa. My throat is parched, words will not come; but to-morrow, appa, you will come again—do come, and then I will tell you all."

It was useless to remain then, and only painful to us both. So I promised to return on the morrow, and went away.

It was a sad case, and I feared there was no hope for him—none whatever. His unwarrantable disaffection began with that of the Southern Mahratta country, where some of its chiefs had, as was proved afterwards, laid their plans for a general insurrection, in connection, no doubt, with Nana Sahib, and the general mutiny in the Bengal army; and the vigorous conduct of General Jacob alone prevented this rebellious movement.

The Rajah of Shorapoor had been early inveigled into these intrigues, and was an active promoter of them. He was invited specially, as an ancient feudatory of the Peshwabs, to join again the Mahratta standard; and owing to his reputed wealth and the numbers of his clan, was not a chief to be overlooked by those disaffected.

If he could be induced to take the field with ten thousand men, the Beydurs of the Raichore Doab, of Bellary, Dharwar, and Belgaum, as well as those also of Mysore, would rise and follow him as their leader, and could plunder as they listed. His vanity and cupidity were excited, and he fell an easy prey to these representations.

Even after the Beydurs of the Southern Mahratta country had received some very severe checks, the attitude of the Shorapoor Rajah was considered threatening and suspicious. He had collected Arabs and Rohilla mercenaries in addition to calling his own clan together, while he was more than suspected to hold communication with foreign mercenaries at Hyderabad. Those were anxious times, and it was impossible to allow any known conspiracy to exist, without watching it very narrowly. A strong force was sent, under Colonel Malcolm, and placed about equidistant between the Beydurs of Shorapoor and those of the Southern Mahratta country ; Colonel Hughes, with a Madras force, watched the eastern frontier of Shorapoor ; and the Contingent troops at Linsoogoor lay, as it were, between, ready to act in concert with either force, according to necessity.

The Resident, however, was very anxious to save the Rajah, and to rescue him from his evil counsellors, feeling a peculiar interest in the boy who had for so long been a ward of the British Government ; and early in January 1858 he despatched his assistant, Captain Rose Campbell, to Shorapoor, to remonstrate with the Rajah, and endeavour to bring him to a sense of his danger, and his promised allegiance to the British Government.

This considerate kindness was, unfortunately, thrown away. The Rajah was in the hands of the worst fanatics of the country, on all sides—even from Mysore and Arcot—and would listen to neither warning nor advice ; and at length, when Captain Campbell received an intimation from the Rajah's own servants and relatives that his life was in serious danger, the force from Linsoogoor was ordered to support him, and arrived at Shorapoor on the 7th February, encamping near the town. A narrow valley, surrounded on all sides by lofty hills and rocks, was pointed out as the camping-ground ; but Captain Arthur Wyndham, who commanded the force, was too wary to be misled, and moved on to an open plain, where he was comparatively safe from any danger of surprise.

At night he was attacked by the Rajah's whole force of Beydurs and foreign mercenaries ; but he held his position bravely, and early in the morning Colonel Hughes, who was at Deodroog, twelve miles distant, and to whom a special messenger had been despatched, arrived with all his troops. It was very plain that had Captain Wyndham remained on the ground first pointed out to him, he would have endured very heavy loss, if not total defeat. As it was, his force suffered but little, but he had inflicted serious damage on the Shorapoor rebels.

Colonel Hughes arrived early on the morning of the 8th, and he and Captain Wyndham, with their united troops, drove the Beydurs and others from the hills into the town with severe loss. Unfortunately Captain Newberry, Madras cavalry, was killed in a charge against a body of Rohillas, and his subaltern, Lieut. Stewart, badly wounded. As the city of Shorapoor was very strong, the approaches difficult of access, and the walls and bastions crowded with defenders, they did not attack it at once, but waited for Colonel Malcolm's force, which had moved close to the western frontier of Shorapoor, and who had been requested to come on with all possible speed.

When this reached the ears of the Rajah, and he heard also that Colonel Malcolm's force had with it a large proportion of English troops, who, together with two companies of the 74th Highlanders under Colonel Hughes, made a sufficiently imposing array—he saw that there was no chance of escape except by flight; and, in the evening, accompanied by a few horsemen, he left Shorapoor, and proceeded direct to Hyderabad.

He believed me to be at Nuldroog, and intended to have given himself up to me there; but hearing on his northern frontier that I had been removed to Berar, he changed his route, and made for Hyderabad, where he arrived with but two followers left. There, having made a fruitless attempt to gain the protection of the Arabs, he was found wandering about the bazaar, was apprehended, and taken to the Minister, Salar Jung, who at once sent him on to the Resident.

Such is an outline of the occurrences that took place, and I hoped that when I next visited the Rajah, he would disclose to me all the particulars of his rebellion and the causes that led to it. I found him much calmer during our second interview, but very reserved on many points.

"Do you remember, appa," he said, "that the day before you left me, you warned me of the evil people who were about me; and you said, if I did not dismiss them, and lead a steady life, I should not hold Shorapoor five years; and I promised you I would send them all away, and look after my own affairs?"

"I remember it well," I replied, "and how you wrote to me and told me that you were in trouble, and would come to me; and I sent you word to do so at once, for that I should now be near your border. But you never came, though I was there nearly a month, and I expected you."

"No," he said, "they would not let me go to you, appa; and if I had gone it would have been no use; you could have done nothing. What was to be has come to pass, and I must bear my fate now, whatever it may be. When that evil wind blew, the people came and said it was the time to rise. The English had lost everything in the north, and were beaten everywhere; they could not keep the country, they said, and were flying to England as fast as they could get to their ships. This was told me, appa, by Brahmins and others from the south, from Poona, from everywhere.

“They promised, by their incantations, to raise me to be Rajah of all the country—from Shorapoor to Rainéshwar—and if I marched at the head of my twelve thousand, they said, all the country would rise, and we should be conquerors. Then Mahrattas from Poona, from Sâttara, from Kolapoor, from Mungoond, from Bheem Rao, who had secured all the disaffected people of Raichore, persuaded me to join them, and offered me what I pleased if I did so; but still I did not go. I was still true to the English and to you. I knew I was right. I did not move a man; nor did I allow one of my people even to go to the assistance of the Beydurs of Hulgully, their brethren, many of whom were slain. And then my people rebelled against me, and called me a ‘coward and a fool,’ because I would not let them go. Arabs and Rohillas now came around me, and one man, worse than all the rest, swore to me on the Korán that the Arabs and Rohillas of Hyderabad, and all the Mussulmans, had declared a crusade against the English ; that the Madras troops would not fight, and they would all come and join me if I would rise. And these men and my own evil companions gave me brandy, and made me drunk, and they took my seal and used it, and led me into evil which I could not help, and did not know.

“ When Captain Campbell came to me with the letter from the Resident, ask him whether I did not receive him with all honour and respect. But the people about me and the Hyderabad men said he was a Kafir and a Feringhee, and that he must die. Had not all true men put to death any English they could find ? And they told me about Cawnpore, and Jhansi, and Delhi, and how all the English had been slain—even women and little children ; and I thought of you—and of your children—girls too,—and I was grieved ; but they made me drunk again, and they determined to murder Captain Campbell the next time he came ; but I sent him private warnings, and this I could prove to you. Ask my uncles ; ask ——, and ——, and others ; they will tell you. Ask Captain Campbell if they did not warn him. I speak no lie why should I ? my life is not worth saving now. I have done too much crime to live ; I dare not tell you all ; you would not touch me or let me come near to you. O appa, appa! why did you leave me? If you had stayed with me, all would have been well! I tell you, if Captain Campbell had come to me again, no one, not I myself, could have saved his life; the men who were to cut him down were standing ready: but he attended to my warnings, and was saved.

"Then the troops came, and when I heard the first gun fired at night, I knew all was gone. I had no faith in my people's courage, although I had not been able to stop their madness, and I went up to a bastion and stood there all night. They told me—what a lie it was!—that the Linsoogoor troops had lost their officers and fled! but when I saw, as day broke, the whole force and the English soldiers driving all my people before them into the city, and a shell burst close to the bastion where I was, killing some, and wounding more—ah! why did it not kill me?—when I saw this, I say, I knew there was no hope left, and I thought to myself, 'I will go to appa, and give him up the Sumusthan to do with as he pleases.'

droog to you. When I got to Narribole, I heard you had gone to Berar, and I turned through the hills and across the jungle to Hyderabad, riding the horse you bought for me. This is all my story, appa; it is true, all of it. If I can remember any more you ought to know, I will tell you. I wish you to know everything."

Hours had passed while he poured out this tale; hours of intense suffering to him, and bitter self-reproach. Sometimes he would stop, and throw his arms round me passionately; sometimes kneel beside me, moaning piteously; again he would burst into loud hysterical sobs which shook his frame. I did my best to soothe him, and gradually he gave me the details narrated above. I have given only the heads, which I took down for the Resident's information. It would be impossible to remember his wild incoherent exclamations, his sudden recurrence to old scenes when he had played as a child about me, with his sisters; of the enjoyment they had had in the magic lantern I showed; of the little vessel on Bohnal Lake, and the happy expeditions there: and all those recollections of his innocent early life, made the scenes through which he had lately passed the more grievous and full of reproach.

I asked him if he would like to see the Resident, who had promised to accompany me on my last visit to him if the Rajah wished it. To my surprise, he drew himself up very proudly, and replied, haughtily—

“No, appa; he would expect me to ask my life of him, and I won't do that. Tell him, if you like, that if the great English people grant me my life, I and mine will be ever true to them; but I deserve to die for what I did, and I will not ask to live like a coward, nor will I betray my people.”

I think this speech, which I reported word for word, pleased the Resident better than anything he had heard of the Rajah before.

“The poor lad has spirit in him,” he said; “and I will not forget all you have told me of him.”

I went once more to see the Rajah, the day before I left for Shorapoor. I should soon see his wife and his other relations, and I wished to know whether he had any instructions or messages for them. He was calm, though he could not repress his old loving ways to me—but very quiet. I told him I was going by dāk to Shorapoor. “What could I do for him there?”

“Appa,” he said, “you remember once I said to you, that the British Government should have Shorapoor if I left no heir ; and I have none. I only wish now I had written this down ; but at that time I had hope still : and I wish now to say, that I want you to have it yourself ; the people love you, and you must never leave it. I will write this with my own hand, if they will give me pen and ink and some paper."

"No," I said, "it could not be as you wish ; and besides, the Government may pardon you when all is known."

"And spare my life ? No—I will never ask it."

"That would not save it," I answered. "If Government is merciful, they will give you your life freely, without your asking it."

"What do you think, appa ? Shall I have to die ?" he asked.

"I think so," I said. "It would be wrong in me to give you any false hope, or to raise the slightest shadow of one in your mind. Many have been false who should have remained true, and you were a child of the English."

"Why do you reproach me ?" he asked, sadly. "You know all ; it was not of my own will, when I was in my senses, appa."

"I do not reproach you," I said, "for I do know all ; but those who will try you do not.

Speak the truth before them boldly, and exactly as you have done to me, and send for me if you think I can help you."

"I will surely tell all," he answered, calmly; "but if they press me to disclose the names of those who excited me, I shall be silent. Government is powerful enough to crush them if they rise. But what can they do? Was I not the strongest among them? And yet, where am I now? Shall I, who have to face death, be faithless to those who trusted me months ago? Never, appa! I would rather die than be sent over the black water, or shut up in a fortress always. Suppose they sentence me to that, I could not bear it. No; the meanest Beydur could not live if he were imprisoned—and shall I, a Rajah?"

"If you have to die," said I, a good deal moved, for there was much nobility in his speech, "die like a brave man."

"I shall not tremble when they tie me up to a gun," he answered, gravely. "If you could be near me to the last, I should be happier. Only one thing, appa—do not let them hang me. I have done nothing to be hanged for, like a robber. Tell the Resident that is all the favour I ask. Promise me to tell him." And I promised.

"I have nothing now to give you, appa," he continued. "They have taken away all I had, even my amulets; but take what you will at Shorapoor, in remembrance of me. As to all my people in the palace, they are yours; and you will care for them, I know. I shall never see them again, now. I ask nothing more."

Then, throwing himself into my arms, he clung to me for a long time, silently; then kissing me gently on the forehead, he said—

"Go, appa—go now. I shall never look upon your face or hear your voice again; but I am thankful to have seen you. Tell them all that you have been with me, and that I was not a coward."

And so I left him, among the men of the guard, who looked on with kindly, wondering eyes.

"He was very fond of you, sir," said one of the sergeants, as I passed out, "and before you came, was asking for you constantly. You must have been as a father to him."

"He was like a child to me," I said, "till evil people came between us, and temptation proved too strong for him. Now, I fear, it is too late to help him."

I told the Resident all that had taken place, on my return, and all the Rajah had said, especially about his not wishing to make any disclosures that would implicate his associates; and he respected the poor boy's reticence on these points.

"We will save him if we can, Taylor, when the time comes," he said. "Just now, things must take their course. But I am sure there is good stuff in the lad; and if we can save his life, he will be all the better for this experience."

My bearers to Shorapoor were laid; my servants and baggage had preceded me by some days—and they would, I hoped, have all ready on my arrival.

Mr Palmer had no hope of the Rajah's life being spared, but he took a great interest in him, and only feared that his death might be considered necessary as a warning to all the plotters in the South, of whom, no doubt, there were many, though there had been no actual rising except the unimportant one at Hyderabad, and the intrigues in the Southern Mahratta country before mentioned.

I bade all Hyderabad friends farewell on the 30th March in the evening, and went on by rhes to Shorapoor, putting up in the villages during the day, for it was too hot to expose myself to the sun. The nights were, fortunately, cool and pleasant still, and I hoped to arrive at my long journey's end by the 3d April, when I should have travelled over 500 miles.

I reached the Bheema river on the morning of 3d April, long before it was light, indeed not long after midnight, hoping to get into Shorapoor soon after daylight ; but it was quite impossible. I found the river-bank crowded with people, from all the villages round, come to welcome me back again to my old scenes, and I had to wait to exchange greetings. Very warm and affectionate they were. "Now," they said, "they would have no more fears ; all would take up their lands and go to work quietly, so long as I remained with them : " and I assured them I should remain. All the head-men, patells, and putwarries, all the principal farmers and traders, assembled to give me the first greetings ; and they told me the road was lined with crowds from all the country-side. Many had been waiting for days, as it was reported I should arrive sooner than I did. When I could get away from these, I passed on in the same manner from that village to the next, always with crowds running beside my palankeen, and a blaze of lights carried by the village torchbearers. Now I had to stop while some old friend dismounted from his horse or pony to embrace me or kiss my feet; and again, when village authorities came out to meet me with their simple offerings and libations of water. I could, in truth, have dispensed with the crowds, for the dust rose heavily in the air, and there was no wind to scatter it, and the torches increased the heat perceptibly, while to sleep was out of the question. When day broke, the throng seemed greater and greater—men, women, and children pressing on my palankeen to touch my feet, or even my clothes—and, as I neared Shorapoor, vast numbers, apparently thousands, came out to meet me, and my bearers could only advance at a slow walk, often being obliged to halt altogether. So, through the first suburb and up the steep road to the city, amidst shouts of the old cry of “Mahadeo Baba,” the scream of pipes and Beydurs’ horns, and thumping of big and little drums, I was conducted into the first street, where further progress was clearly impossible.

I had never before seen even this excitable people so frantic; women weeping passionately, grasping my hands, kissing my clothes, or touching my feet—crying, “Oh, you are come again; we see you; we shall suffer no more!” They raised their children above their heads and showed me to them, showering blessings on me the while.

The terraced house-tops were full likewise, and the shouts and cries quite indescribable. It was now eleven o'clock, and my slow progress through the town occupied almost an hour more. The sun was blazing hot, and I was faint and wearied out; still the showers of garlands, the handfuls of sweet powder and dyed rice, thrown on and over me, continued till I was close to the palace guard, when my bearers turned in, and I was free.

Captain Wyndham and all the officers had been most anxious, especially when the shouts were heard as I entered the streets; and my delay was so unaccountable that they feared I had met with opposition, till they were assured I was only "being welcomed," and therefore abandoned their idea of sending a troop of cavalry, which they had ready, to my assistance.

I had never dreamed of such a welcome. It was intensely gratifying, and I was deeply affected by the feeling displayed by all, which could not be mistaken. Captain Wyndham and others had seen something of my reception from the roof of the palace, and had wondered not a little, as I had myself. It proved, at any rate, that I was not forgotten; and I thanked God for this from my heart very gratefully. The English officers congratulated me very warmly.

I was very glad of a refreshing bath and a substantial breakfast, which had been got ready for me ; and then I lay down to have a sleep, which I needed much after the night's work. When I awoke, several old native friends were waiting for me. We were located in the new palace I had built for the Rajah, which afforded good airy shelter for us all. The large upper room was the "mess" and public room, and soon all the male members of the Rajah's family and State officers assembled there—Pid Naik's sons, their uncles, and great-uncle.

All were as much concerned as I was at the unexpected events which had led to my second arrival at Shorapoor ; but they told me that for more than a year past they had lived in perpetual alarm at the conduct of the Rajah, who seemed to have become quite deranged by constant intoxication.

In the evening I went to see the Ranees, who had assembled at the house of the father of the eldest Ranee, close to the palace. As may be imagined, it was a sad and trying scene for us all. I could not either console them or hold out any hope that the Rajah's life would be spared. They had, too, lost all they possessed, except the few ornaments they wore. When the Rajah had desired them to escape the night he fled, they had gone out by the northern gate on foot, and made the best of their way to villages, where they were sheltered by the people. Some few women-servants followed them; but when they heard the Rajah had gone to Hyderabad, and was a prisoner, they took advantage of a proclamation issued by Captain Campbell, and ventured back to Shorapoor—not to the palace, as that was occupied by troops and soldiers, but to the house where I found them. Some of their clothes had been sent to them, but everything valuable was declared prize property, and was confiscated.

When the ladies grew more calm, I told them about my interviews with the Rajah, and the various messages he had sent to them. They had almost expected to have heard before now of his public execution.

“I could not save him, appa,” cried Rungama, the chief Ranec, whom I had petted as a child—“I could not save him; he was quite mad of late, drinking brandy those horrible men gave him constantly, which made him furious. Then, when he was quiet, he used to lay his head in my lap, and call for you, and tell me he knew he should lose the Sumasthan, but that he would die like a soldier at the gates if the city were attacked.

Again and again we all implored him to go to you, but we did not know you were so far away; and he always said if he left, the Rohillas and Arabs would plunder the city, because he owed them so much—and so he stayed."

According to an arrangement made with the Resident, I issued a general amnesty to all except certain persons who had been leaders and excitors of this most miserable rebellion. The people of the city and of the suburbs were still in the villages to which they had fled; but now they returned. All the shops were opened; and in a few days the markets were full, and firewood, fruit, and vegetables were as plentiful as ever. Captain Wyndham's company occupied the palace, and were ordered to secure all valuables as "prize." My house was tenanted by a company of the 74th Highlanders. The troops of all arms had entered the city; but though property of every kind had been summarily looted, the people had remained unmolested.

In the treasury there remained nothing except a few State jewels; others had been hurriedly secreted, but were returned by those who had them in charge. I do not think a single article was missing, and any coin found had become prize-money.

I deeply regretted that all the old records had been either burnt or destroyed, — letters from former kings of Beejapoor and Beeder, Rajahs of Beejanugger ; of the Emperor Aurungzeeb, with the impress of his large hand dipped in sandal-wood ; of the Peshwahs, and others. Great portions of these I had already translated, and had intended to continue when I should have leisure, hoping to complete a very interesting historical State paper ; but all were gone now.

The Resident allowed me to draw on the Residency treasury for as much as I required, and I got bills cashed as they were wanted for current expenditure. Many of the patells and heads of villages came in during the first week and assured me as to the cultivation of the country, and that such of the newly-cleared land as could be managed would be taken up at once ; so altogether there seemed a fair prospect of revenue.

The investigation upon the occurrences which led to the rebellion was cut short as much as possible. There was no good in raking up old scores, especially as the Rajah, as chief of all, had been the one responsible, and he was on his trial at Hyderabad. There was one man, a Mussulman of Hyderabad, who had preached a holy war at Shorapoor, and had been the insti gator-in-chief of much trouble, and who, in concert with a wicked Brahmin whom I remembered, Krishna Shastree, pretended to miraculous power and divination. These two had, by their false prophecies and mischievous counsels, deluded the Rajah more than any others; and, as dangerous characters, were worthy of death, or at least transportation for life.

The Brahmin eluded all pursuit, and disappeared. The Mussulman, however, was apprehended after some time at Hyderabad, and sent to me for trial, when evidence was produced conclusive as to the projected murder of Captain Campbell, in which he was to have taken an active part; and his own treasonable conspiracies being distinctly proved, he was condemned to death. The sentence was confirmed by the Resident, and he was publicly hanged at Shorapoor.

The great interest of the time was centred in the Rajah's fate. There was no doubt, had he been taken in arms during the attack by Wyndham's force, that he would have been at once tried and summarily executed—and even now there seemed but small chance of his life; but the Resident wrote to me saying he thought, if I asked it, the Rajah's life might be granted, especially if I explained with what ruffians he had been surrounded, and how misled.

A few hours after my arrival in Shorapoor the old Brahmin priest came to me privately.

"Do you remember, Sahib," he asked, "what I once told you, and what the Rance said when we were with her at her bedside?"

"Perfectly," I answered; "you said the Rajah would not live to complete his twenty-fourth year, and that he would lose his country."

"Yes, Sahib," he went on; "part of the prediction is already fulfilled, and the rest will surely follow—it is quite inevitable."

"Do you think the Rajah knew of the prediction?" I inquired. "If he did, it may have made him reckless."

"I do not think he knew it," replied the old priest; "for the last time I saw the box it was in the treasury, with the seals unbroken, as you left it."

(Captain Wyndham had secured the box, and kept the horoscope with the rolls of calculations as a curiosity, not knowing their purport.)

"We cannot say," I continued, "what may yet happen; the proceedings are not over, and the Resident and I are both determined to save the Rajah's life if we can."

"It's no use, Sahib," returned the Shastree, shaking his head mournfully; "your intentions are merciful, but you are helpless before his fate. He will die—how, we may not see; but he must die—he cannot live. You, Sahib, and I, are the only two living that possess this secret, and you must be so good as to tell me directly you know his sentence. I cannot believe that the Government will spare him. I firmly expect that he will be blown away from a gun."

When the Resident's letter came, I sent for the old Shastree and read it to him, and also my own strong appeal in reply. "I hope the Rajah's life is now safe," I said. "Listen to what I have written. The Governor-General, who is kind and merciful, will scarcely refuse this request, supported by the Resident."

The old man shook his head sadly. "Till the last day has passed to which the calculation extends, I have no hope," he said; "it cannot be wrong, and but little time remains. It grieves me, Sahib, to go over the figures again, but the present aspect of the planets is very calamitous to the Rajah, and all through next month the combinations show extreme danger. We cannot help him, and you have done all you could ; you can do no more—only wait.” So we did, anxiously.

From the time I had quitted Shorapoor, no regular accounts appeared to have been made up ; but I had been joined by my old head accountant, Seeta Ram Rao, now Assistant Deputy-Commissioner, to whom I could offer better pay, and who was rejoiced to serve again under me. He knew all about the revenues of Shorapoor, and could help materially. A schedule of the whole period of the Rajah's administration was drawn out, and the result was that three and a half lakhs, or £35,000, of new debt had been contracted, while every rupee of the former surplus had altogether disappeared.

We had much to do in revising district accounts ; but all was progressing well, and my life was a very pleasant one. I had charming companions in Wyndham and his wife, who became my very dear friends, and our love and friendship will continue while life lasts. They were interested in all my doings, and it used to be a great delight to me to show them all my roads and the improvements I had made during my residence at Shorapoor. The roads were sadly out of repair, but we scrambled over them on horseback, and I soon had them put to rights again.

I could not get back my house while the 74th remained; but I held my cucherry in the hospital, and was constructing a large, airy, thatched barrack for the soldiers.

The Rajah of Shorapoor had been sentenced to death; but the Resident had commuted his sentence to transportation for life, which was the most his power admitted of. This sentence had, however, been still further commuted by the Governor-General to four years' imprisonment in a fortress near Madras (I think Chingleput). In addition, the Rajah was to be allowed to have such of his wives as he pleased with him, and his own servants. If he showed evidence of reform and steadiness, his principality was to be restored to him.

I sent off at once for the Shastree.

"Listen," said I, "to the gracious and merciful determination of the Governor-General. The Rajah's life is safe; and if he is quiet and steady for four short years, he will regain his State! What could be more considerate or more lenient? What becomes now of the prophecy? This letter proves it is false."

"I wish I could think so, Sahib," he sighed, "and that my poor young master were really safe; but, alas! he is in the greatest danger. Nay, it seems closer than ever now; but we shall see, Sahib. Sometimes a merciful God puts away the evil omens just as the fulfilment of them is imminent. I will go and tell the Rance this good news. I only wish the time were past, and that I could be happy in it too."

The Rance would hardly believe the message I sent her. She and the other Rances were to join the Rajah almost directly, and were to make their preparations at once.

The head Rance, Rungama, asked me to come to her; and when I entered, quite regardless of etiquette, she threw herself into my arms, and danced about in the wildest glee. She had expected the news of her husband's death when she saw the old Shastree come into her rooms, and the revulsion of feeling was almost too much for her. She and one other Rance were to go. The third was no favourite with the Rajah.

A few days after, the Resident's order finally came that the ladies were to be sent off on a certain day to meet the Rajah at Kurnool. Everything had been already prepared; there need be no delay; and I intended them to start that very afternoon. I took leave of them both in the morning, and had settled down to my work after breakfast was over. It chanced to be a day set apart for the arrangement of yearly allowances and gifts to Brahmins, and all the chief Brahmins were present, and the old Shastree among them. Several were seated at the table with me, assisting me, when suddenly I heard the clash of the express-runner's bells coming up the street. I thought it might be some message from Linsogoor, or some new arrangement for the Ranees' departure. The runner entered the palace court, and his packet was soon in my hands. It contained a few lines only, from the Resident:—

“The Rajah of Shorapoor shot himself this morning dead, as he arrived at his first encampment. I will write particulars when I know them.”

My countenance naturally changed; and the old Shastree, who was beside me, and had been reading over Sanscrit deeds and grants to me, caught hold of my arm, and, peering into my face, cried, almost with a shriek—

“He's dead! he's dead! I know it by your face—it tells me, Sahib, he's dead!”

“Yes,” I said, sorrowfully. “Yes, he is dead;

he shot himself at the first stage out of Secunderabad, and died instantly."

Then ensued a sad scene of weeping and wailing; and one of my friends in the adjoining room, hearing the tumult, rushed in, crying, "Thank God, you are safe! I feared something terrible had happened. Why are these people so agitated?"

"It is terrible enough," I answered. "The Rajah has shot himself, and the news has just come by express."

"Ah!" said the old priest, as soon as he could speak, "he could not escape his fate, and the prophecy is fulfilled."

It was, indeed, a strange accomplishment of the prediction. In a few days more the Rajah would have completed his twenty-fourth year; and now he had died by his own hand! I sent for the Ranee's father, and bade him break the news gently to his daughter. I could not bear to see the poor girl's misery, and I should have to visit her later; so he and an old friend of his departed to perform their sad task.

The day after, I heard by another express the particulars. The Rajah had been told of the Governor-General's commutation of his sentence, and was very deeply grateful for the mercy shown to him. He had promised earnestly to try and deserve the consideration which had been extended him, and was particularly pleased that he was to be allowed the society of his two Ranees, speaking joyously of the prospect of meeting them at Kurnool.

He had travelled in a palankeen, with the officer commanding his escort near him, all the way to their camp.

When they arrived, the officer took off his belt, in which was a loaded revolver, hung it over a chair, and went outside the tent. While washing his face a moment afterwards, he heard a shot, and, running back, found the Rajah lying on the ground quite dead. The ball had entered his stomach and passed through the spine.

Was the act intentional? I think not. He had a trick always of taking up and examining everything lying near him, more especially if it were new to him; and he had had this habit from childhood, and I had often checked him for it. I do not think he could ever have seen a revolver—and such a weapon would be too tempting to escape notice; he would be sure to snap it, or meddle with the lock, and the pistol may have exploded without his intending it at all. No one was with him—no one saw him,—so that only conjectures could be raised about the event ; but I, who knew him well, do not believe it was suicide.

Whether accidental or intentional, the result was the same. The Rajah was dead, and his kingdom was lost, ere he completed his twenty-fourth year ; and the grim old prophecy deduced from the horoscope was literally fulfilled !

CHAPTER XVI.

TOWARDS the end of May, Lord Elphinstone and the Resident had both been extremely anxious in regard to Shorapoor and its Beydur population.

It had transpired at the Rajah's trial, and had previously been suspected, that certain chiefs of the Southern Mahratta country had formed a plan for insurrection ; but as the Rajah had refused to give any names, or to implicate others in any way, no action could be taken : and the Rajah simply pleaded in his defence that he had refused to join the rebellion when invited and pressed to do so. General Jacob had taken the precaution, very wisely, of disarming Meeraj, a very strong fort ; and his admirable check of formidable rebellion at Kolapoor, and the active measures he used, effectually crushed the hopes of the insurrectionists. I have little doubt that had the Rajah gone to the assistance of the Beydurs of Hulgully when they asked his aid, the whole of the Southern Mahratta country and Raichore would have joined him in far greater force than they afterwards displayed when they rose at last on the 29th May 1858, under the chief of Mirgoona, and openly murdered Mr Thomson, a Bombay civilian, who had ventured to remonstrate with them.

Another rising was planned by one Bheem Rao, formerly a Government collector at Bellary, who with 250 men took up his position in the fort of Kopaldroog, but was pursued and killed by Major Hughes and a detachment from Linsoogoor. The remainder of the rebels were taken prisoners, and either hanged or shot.

There were many such parties in the Deccan; and I confess that, when I heard of these troubles, I wondered what my Beydurs would do: but they had received sufficient warning in the fate of their Rajah and in the prompt discomfiture of their rebellious neighbours, and not a man stirred or showed the slightest sign of insubordination. They even assisted me materially in guarding the frontier, and the ferries across the Bheema, against the insurgents who tried to pass through Shorapoor. The Arabs of Hyderabad employed by the late Rajah were satisfied that the Beydurs would soon join them if they could only enter the country, and were not a little discomfited to find these very people guarding their country against their entrance. So, finding they could get no sympathy, all disturbance ceased, and we were once more at peace ; and I could assure Lord Elphinstone, with whom I had been in private correspondence, that no apprehension of the Beydurs being induced to join the rebel party need be entertained.

The victories won by Sir Hugh Rose, that of Gwalior, and the death of the Ranee of Jhansi, the capture of the Nawab of Banda and his treasure, Sir Hope Grant's proceedings in Oudh, and the seizure of Tantia Topee—all these went to prove that the power of the Mutiny was broken, and that India would soon be at peace in all its borders.

How earnestly I had looked forward to this year as the one in which I should again see all my dear ones in England ! but now leave was impossible to obtain, and indeed no one would have asked it, except it were urgently needed for health's sake. Fortunately I was in too good condition to ask for a medical certificate, though at times I had much suffering. My father proposed to bring my children to me; but in my present position I felt it would hardly do. I had no home for them; my work was of a very unsettled nature, and the country was still very much disturbed. I consulted the Resident; but he earnestly begged me not to risk such a step, adding that he knew I sorely needed change, and it was better to wait another year, when leave could be obtained without difficulty. I felt he was right, and a very serious fit of illness in September warned me that I should soon need rest from work; but I recovered, and went on as usual again.

Authentic ghost-stories are comparatively rare; but a circumstance occurred at Shorapoor which made a great impression on men's minds, and may be accepted as one.

There were two companies of the 74th Highlanders at Shorapoor with Colonel Hughes's force. After the place was taken, one company was located, as I have before stated, in my house on the hill, the other remaining in camp below the town, till they should return to Bellary. One afternoon—I have forgotten the date—Capt. —, the senior officer, was sitting in his tent writing letters for England, as the mail letters had to be forwarded by that evening's post, and had had the side wall of his tent opened for light and air, when a young man of his company appeared suddenly before him in his hospital dress, without his cap, and, without saluting him, said, "I wish, sir, you would kindly have my arrears of pay sent to my mother, who lives at ——; please take down the address." Capt. —— took down the address mechanically, and said, "All right, my man, that will do;" and, again making no salute, the man went away. A moment after, Capt. —— remembered that the dress and appearance of the soldier, and his manner of coming in, were highly irregular, and desired his orderly to send the sergeant to him directly.

"Why did you allow —— to come to me in that irregular manner?" he asked, as soon as the sergeant came.

The man was thunderstruck. "Sir," he exclaimed, "do you not remember he died yesterday in hospital, and was buried this morning? Are you sure, sir, you saw him?"

"Quite sure," was the reply; "and here is a memorandum I took down from him of his mother's address. to whom he wished his pay should be sent."

"That is strange, sir," said the sergeant; "his things were sold by auction to-day, and I could not find where the money should be sent in the company's registry, but it may be in the general registry with the regiment."

The books were searched; the address taken down was proved to be correct, and the circumstance made a profound impression upon all who knew the facts.

These Highlanders were capital fellows—very steady in a town where there were all sorts of temptations to excess. As the weather grew cooler, they got up a play—a melodrama—called, I think, "The Maniac Lover," and acted it well in the cucherry. Many of the Shorapoor "gentry" and their wives being invited, the latter sat ensconced behind bamboo screens; and although no word could be understood, the natives applauded very vigorously. I wrote a ballad, entitled the "Battle of Shorapoor," with a very long string of verses, which became exceedingly popular, and detailed the march of the troops, the fight, with various incidents, and the final discomfiture of the rebels; and this was constantly sung with great spirit, all joining in the chorus. The men had also games of cricket, skittles, &c., to amuse them, and some were even fond of chess.

The officers were pleasant companions, and we generally dined together. They were succeeded by a company of H.M.'s 56th Regiment in June.

I laid out a new road into the town, which was about 24 feet wide and about a mile long, leading from the alley up to the north gate. Its deepest gradient was 1' in 25', and along it carts and pack-bullocks could travel easily. My plantations of mango and tamarind trees were generally thriving, and the oldest ones were now bearing fruit. Bohnal tank required no repairs, and was quite complete in all respects; but as to the others, nothing had been done, except a little at Kuchaknoor. No outlay upon public works had been permitted since I left.

By June all the arrangements of estates and pensions were reported as finished. There were objections to the Rances receiving their estates back again, for the present at any rate; but an allowance of £1000 a-year was settled on Rungama, and pensions on the other ladies in proportion. Rungama was very grateful; she did not expect half so much. I often paid her a visit, and she was gradually growing more cheerful and resigned.

The year closed pleasantly to me, though I could not get leave to England; but as soon as ever the prohibitions were withdrawn, I was prepared to ask for it. The survey in Nuldroog was to be carried on according to my plan, as an experiment, although my present duties did not admit of my taking up the surveyorship.

The Governor-General was pleased to record of me that "Captain Meadows Taylor has been deputed to Shorapoor, where his past experience and local knowledge make his presence most invaluable."

It was not yet decided who should take my place at Nuldroog. Mr Maltby had been obliged to go to England; and my friend Bullock was acting for him—without any hope, however, of obtaining the appointment permanently, as it was far too good for an "uncovenanted servant" to aspire to! We had all hoped that the gracious proclamation issued on her Majesty's assumption of the Government of India, which I had the pleasure of reading in Oordoo and Mahratta to the people of Shorapoor, would have extended to us, and done away with the invidious distinctions "covenanted" and "uncovenanted;" but it was not to be so.

At the close of the year I had a visit from the executive engineer in the Raichore district, who came to look at my contemplated works, and checked the levels and surveys of the great Kuchaknoor tank. There was a slight error of fourteen-hundredths of a foot detected in the outward bench-marks of the embankment ; but in all other respects my work, even with the imperfect instruments I had used, was entirely correct. I proposed to go on and complete the tank ; but until some decision was come to about the principality, no public work of magnitude could be attempted. The Resident had gone up to Calcutta to confer with Lord Canning, and perhaps the fate of Shorapoor would be decided by them. However, in the end, it was left uncertain.

A very unpleasant affair had taken place at Hyderabad. At a reception which the Nizam had held, and at which the Minister and the Resident had both been present, a man had fired a loaded pistol either at the Resident or the Minister, who were coming out together. It could not be determined for whom the shot was intended. Fortunately the ball missed both, but wounded the Minister's foster-brother. The ruffian then drew his sword and made a cut at the Minister, which an attendant received upon his arm, and the villain was immediately cut down by Captain Hastings Fraser and others standing by. The scene had been exciting and disagreeable, and showed plainly that the germs of treason were not yet destroyed. There was, however, no further disturbance.

I could get no satisfactory answer to my application for furlough to England, being answered that, as soon as the question of the Shorapoor State was decided, I should know my fate ; and meanwhile, if it were at all possible, I was to hold on.

At the beginning of May 1859 I had finished my tour of the district, and made a settlement for the current year. The country was in a wretched condition. A great mass of the cultivation had been thrown up the year before. The farmers had been deprived of their best lands by the Rajah, who had given them to his favourites. There were no proper accounts, and the whole was in worse confusion than when I had first taken over charge. Numbers of families had emigrated in disgust. I could give very little assurance to any, as to future settlements ; and, indeed, I was forbidden to do so, for Government was still silent as to the destiny of the State.

I did what I could, but it amounted to very little. The people would not invest their capital unless the country were to remain under British rule, and I could not conscientiously counsel them to do so. "Directly you went away the last time," they said, "the men about the Rajah chose the best of our newly-cleared lands, and they were taken from us and given to them. True, you have now given them back to us ; but can you assure us that the same won't happen again if your back is turned ? Let us wait and see what will happen."

No change occurred in my position until August, when, in addition to Shorapoor, the whole of the Raichore Doab was put under my charge ; and as Raichore had been deeply disaffected, I was desired to report upon its condition specially. I did not relish this employment ; and I began to fear, too, that this accession to my duties would prevent my going to England, as I had hoped to do, the year following. I was now by no means strong, and I looked to the future with grave anxiety. With Raichore and Shorapoor combined, I should have a country quite 20,000 square miles in area under my jurisdiction, and a population hardly under, perhaps exceeding, two millions. There was but one English assistant, with four native assistants, in Raichore : but my assistant in Shorapoor, Seeta Ram Rao, was a host in himself, and I could trust that province to him with every confidence.

It appeared, too, that I was to receive no additional pay for my extra work; but there was no help for it. The order came, and was obeyed with the best grace I could command.

I went to Linsoogoor for a few days, and there performed the sad and painful task of reading the burial service over a dear friend's wife, who had died suddenly, and who expressed a wish that I should be the one to perform this last sad office for her. I could not stay long, but simply took charge of the province, returning again to Shorapoor to investigate a trial for murder—a very difficult and complicated case, which no one but myself could dispose of. Captain and Mrs Wyndham accompanied me, and remained till October, when we moved out to Bohnal, to begin my tour.

It was a delightful time, cool and pleasant. There had been a good monsoon, and the lake was full and running over. We had charming rides every morning over the roads, both old and new, and which were now as smooth as gravel-walks.

After a fortnight spent at Bohnal, where the schooner was in capital order and in constant use, we set out for the western frontier, so as to visit the great falls of the Krishna, which I wanted to show my friends. I took them also to the cairns and cromlechs I had discovered, and we all enjoyed our holiday at the falls most thoroughly.

Here the great river Krishna leaves the table-land of the Deccan, and falls, by a descent of 408 feet in about three miles, into the lower level of Shorapoor. The fall itself is not perpendicular, but becomes a roaring cataract half a mile broad when the river is in flood. The scene then is indescribably grand, an enormous broken volume of water rushing down an incline of granite with a roar that can be easily heard at a distance of thirty miles, and a cloud of spray dashing up high into the air; while the irregularity of the incline, its huge rocks, and the deep holes which the waters have excavated, increase the wonderful effect of the cataract, and brilliant rainbows flash through the spray, changing with every breath of wind. Finally, the water falls into a deep pool, which becomes a whirling mass covered with billows that, rushing in every direction, clash and break against each other, sending up great piles of foam. As a Beydur standing beside me said, "It is like all the white horses in the world fighting together, and tossing their manes into the air." Nor was the simple fellow's illustration without point.

I had never seen such a sight during my life, and perhaps few cataracts in the world can surpass it, when in flood, for sublimity and beauty.

I believe few English people have visited this spot. I, at least, have never met any traveller who had heard of it. When we were there, the water was lower than on my first visit; but the effect of the fall, the rocky gorge below clothed with wood, and the grand old fort at the end, partly Hindoo and partly Mussulman, was very beautiful.

Our route lay across the ford, which was a memorable spot in history, when the Mussulman army crossed to engage that of Beejanugger in the battle which was fought on the south bank of the Krishna in 1565. The ford had been carried by a bold stratagem. The Mussulman leaders marched slowly up the left bank of the river for two days, watched by the Hindoo troops, who left the ford almost unguarded. The Mussulmans then doubled back, carried the defences of the ford by storm, and the whole army followed. By this utter defeat of their opponents, the Mussulmans gained possession of the city of Beejanugger and the whole of the northern portion of the kingdom.

quite traceable at the ford, and corresponding in all respects with the description given by Ferishta. From hence to Linsoogoor was only an easy march, and we returned into cantonments.

At the end of October I started on my first march to Moodgul. I dared not loiter longer, and felt I must see with my own eyes, and hear with my own ears, before I could report specially upon the district.

I found a good road to Moodgul, and the canter in the fresh morning air was delicious. Moodgul is a fine old fort, built upon a group of granite rocks rising perhaps 100 feet above the plain. It had been a bone of contention from the earliest times of the Bahmany dynasty, and alternately fell into the possession of the Hindoos or the Mussulmans, whichever chanced to be, for the time, the strongest party. Now it was considerably ruined, but most picturesque, and I explored it thoroughly.

I could only stay two days, and these were mostly occupied in inquiring into a dispute relating to a Christian settlement there, which, as it involved religious jurisdiction between his Holiness the Pope and the Archbishop of Goa, I was incompetent to decide. The congregation were all weavers of blankets, and shepherds, originally converted by one of St Francis Xavier's missionaries from Goa. It had been somewhat richly endowed by the several kings of the Adil Shahy dynasty of Beejapoor, and it still retained these grants through all revolutions. There were two other congregations in the Doab, one being composed of potters at Raichore; the name of the place of the other I forget. The church at Moodgul was a humble but respectable edifice, and service was performed by a deacon, the Mass in full being celebrated when a priest came from Goa on his rounds.

On my arrival some time after in England, I wrote to his Eminence Cardinal Wiseman about this congregation, furnishing him with all particulars respecting them, and received a courteous reply, to the effect that my communication was both valuable and extremely interesting, and would be duly forwarded to Rome.

I hoped next to visit the grand old city of Beejanugger, and to add some sketches to my collection. At the town of Kanakgherry the Rajah came out to welcome me, and entertained me most hospitably. Here I saw the finest Hindoo temple I had yet visited. The interior was supported by huge pillars of granite, in the form of horses, on which female figures were mounted;

the frieze and ceiling were richly ornamented in carving. I do not think it is much known, but it well repays a visit. After breakfast the Rajah came to me, and Shorapoor and its affairs were the subject of discussion. "Could I give any hope," he asked, "of its being restored to the family? would the British keep it? or would the Nizam have it?"

I could say nothing, for nothing had been determined upon. My friend, whom I had often before seen at Shorapoor, deprecated the idea of the Nizam having Shorapoor.

"Why should the people suffer more oppression?" he said. "Of course I would wish to see it given back to the family—my relatives; but if that may not be, why should the Nizam get it? The 12,000 Beydurs would far prefer the just rule of the English, and would not revert to their evil ways under you."

Such was the old gentleman's opinion, and I agreed with him perfectly; but I had no hope of the restoration of the family being allowed. Pid Naik's eldest son, who was the next heir, was steady, sensible, and thoroughly loyal, having opposed his cousin, the late Rajah, in all his insurrectionary movements; still, I thought the British Government would eventually annex

From Kanakgherry I went on to Anagoondy, where the lineal descendant of the great Rajahs of Beejanugger resided. He had sent me a very pressing invitation to come and visit him, and volunteered to show all the marvels of Beejanugger to me on my arrival. Anagoondy, "The Elephant's Corner," had once been a suburb of Beejanugger, and proved to be one of the most curious places I had ever visited. To the north was a perfectly inaccessible range of bare granite hills, surmounted by piles of fantastic rocks, along the tops of which ran high walls, with bastions at intervals, in the Hindoo style. The only entrance to this labyrinth of rocks was through a very narrow gorge on the eastern side, also strongly fortified by double walls and large bastions. Passing round the corners of these walls, the ground opened out to some degree, and was cultivated, affording a lovely view of the rugged hills on the south side of the Tungabuddhra, a rough brawling river rushing through the valley.

The Rajah had made a good road through his estate, and showed me many points which afforded exquisite views of wood, rock, and water, with the mountains in the background ; and he always stopped the carriage at these places, to show me the prospect, with evident enjoyment. He was driving a handsome light phaeton, and met me at the barrier. He was a fine active young man, with a very pleasing and intelligent countenance, and we were soon good friends. He had prepared the porch of a temple on the bank of the river for me, and I found an ample breakfast provided, and his own servants in attendance.

The situation of the town among these most picturesque piles of rock was very curious. I went to return the Rajah's visit in the afternoon, when he proposed to take me to his island in the evening. I willingly agreed. I found his reception-room nicely furnished in the English style ; and we sat chatting pleasantly for a long time. He seemed pleased to find me acquainted with his family history—their wars with the Mussulmans, and their final gallant struggle with the crusade against them in 1565.

“ Ah ! ” he said, “ my ancestor, Ram Raj, alone would have beaten them back ; but the coalition of four kingdoms of the Deccan proved too strong for him. They are all gone now, and have left no trace except these cities—not a soul to pray for their manes, or light a lamp in their name ; while I still am here, and represent my great ancestors as their lineal descendant. I have only the 'Elephant Corner' of the great city to live in, it is true ; but I am quite content, and the Nizam allows me this corner and its dependencies, while the English have granted me some lands on the south bank of the river, and a pension."

"I always go down to the island by myself," he said ; "it is such good fun shooting the rapid ; but I have men there to paddle me up again in a bigger boat."

I got into the little craft, and he pushed off into the stream, striking as directly across it as the current would allow. We were soon drawn into the rapid, and dashed on for a quarter of a mile at great speed—the Rajah with his long bamboo pole fending the boat from rocks on either side very skilfully, and evidently intensely enjoying the excitement.

At the end of the shoot, we entered the still water, where the island was situated—a richly-wooded spot, laid out as a garden in the English style, well stocked with fruit-trees and a profusion of roses and gardenias, whose scent filled the evening air with perfume. In the centre was a pretty pavilion, also in the English style ; and this was, the Rajah told me, his favourite resort. There were numbers of tame pea-fowl ; and at his peculiar call some cranes and flamingoes, with geese and ducks, all came flocking round us to be fed—a motley and curious collection. “These are my pets,” said the Rajah, “and my children’s too.”

When it was growing dark, his gardeners brought a large basket-boat to the landing-place, and six stout fellows paddled us up the rapid to my resting-place. I had spent a very interesting day, and my host pressed me much to remain some time ; but this was impossible—my tents had already gone on to Humpee on the south bank of the river, where the old city commenced, and I had much to see there. “If you really must go,” said the Rajah, “I will take you there myself in my large boat, and you will then see the views from the river, which are very striking, and more interesting than those on the road ; but I wish you could stay—you are the only Englishman with whom I ever felt on easy terms of friendship ; and none of your people seem to know or to remember who I am.”

The Rajah was punctual to the time appointed next morning, and brought a stout crew with him, as we should have to paddle up several rapids ; and before sunrise we were off.

It was a lovely voyage of several miles. At each bend of the beautiful river new prospects opened, and new piles of granite rocks, some of them 500 feet in height, came in view, fringed with trees and brushwood, which softened their grim outlines, and rendered the effects of light and shade most charming. I took many sketches from the water, while the Rajah looked on wonderingly, and longed to be able to do so likewise. At last the "Gate of the River," as it is called, came in sight, where the stream lessens to a very narrow pass, bounded by piles of rock of the most fantastic forms imaginable ; and leaving our boat at the landing-place, we walked up to the courtyard of the great temple, in the cloisters of which I found my servants had taken up a comfortable position, instead of pitching my tents.

"If I can, I will come to-morrow," said the Rajah ; "but in any case, you must not go till I return. I must be with you when you go over the great temple."

After breakfast I ordered my palankeen, and wandered over the western portions of the city. I saw that the barriers of rocks extended to the south, forming a strong line of defence, the only aperture being a pass between them and the spurs of the Raman Mullay Mountain. This was the pass by which the Bahmany king, Mujahid Shah, entered the lines of defence in 1378, and endeavoured to take the city ; but owing to the neglect of one of his generals, who had been directed to occupy an eminence to the west of the city, which was the real key to the place, and who failed in his duty, the king could only penetrate the first line of defence, where a huge image of Hunooman, the monkey-god, stands alone, carved out of a great granite boulder.

The king, on seeing it surrounded by Brahmins, charged and dispersed them ; then dismounting, he struck the image with his steel mace, breaking off a portion of the right leg.

“For this act,” cried a dying Brahmin, “thou shalt die before thou reach the city”—a prophecy strictly fulfilled ; for King Mujahid was assassinated on his march to Gulburgah. In Ferishta, a vivid description is given of this battle ; and the positions occupied by the contending parties are so exactly mentioned, that they are, to this day, easily traceable.

I spent all the day sketching. The Rajah's sleeping-palace was a curious conception of Musulman-Gothic architecture, the upper rooms of which would make a delightful residence if purged from the bats, swallows, and wild-pigeons' nests. The fine tower, with a Gothic pavilion at the top, from whence there is a glorious view; the elephant stables and treasury, still perfect; and the ruins of the Rajah's palaces, and their courtyards, which are very extensive—with a host of other picturesque scenes, and masses of ruins,—gave me more than enough to do with my pencil and my brush. Beejanugger is well described by the Nawab Abd-ul Buzzak, a Persian merchant, who visited the city in 1443, and resided there. His account of the population and general aspect of the city, the religious ceremonials, and the splendour of the king's court, are very graphic and eminently truthful. The journal has been translated for the Hakluyt Society, and well repays perusal. I have described the temple in a volume published by Mr Murray on the 'Temples of Western India,' and I endeavoured to extract my information from the most authentic sources.

CHAPTER XVII.

AFTER breakfast, the Rajah arrived in his chair, which he insisted upon my using, while he took my palankeen instead; and we set off for the temple which had been built by his ancestor, Achoot Rao, in 1534-36. Anything more exquisitely beautiful, or so wondrously finished, could hardly be conceived—except, perhaps, the temple of Nundidroog, which even excels this in some particulars; but that of Kanakgherry, which I had considered very marvellous, sinks into insignificance before this.

Lofty pillars of granite support the roof, carved out of solid blocks of stone; some of these are fashioned like horses or lions; on the horses' backs ride female figures: others have rows of slender figures round them, cut away from the main stem, giving a graceful airy effect, which is very charming. Every portion of the interior is covered with rich, minute carving, and some parts were polished like glass.

Outside, the basement consists of rows of elephants, above these run several courses of different ornaments of elegant patterns. The projecting eaves of the cornices are likewise elaborately carved; and the whole presented an appearance of extreme lightness and grace, which I had not before noticed in any Hindoo edifice. Tippoo Sultan, when encamped near Beejanugger, had had a mine sprung in the roof, in the hope of destroying the building; but it had only made a small hole, and Tippoo then said he had been warned in a dream not to attempt to destroy the holy temple. The deity to whom it was dedicated was "Withul" or Krishna, and it had been the intention of one of the Rajah's ancestors to have removed the holy image from Pundharpoor to it, as being a more appropriate dwelling-place; the god, however, refused to stir, and, in consequence, the building has never been fully consecrated.

Close to the exterior of the temple there is what appeared to me to be a richly-ornamented triumphal car, to be used on festivals; but this proved to be also of granite—a great boulder having been wrought as it stood into the perfect resemblance of a car, the wheels of which seemed only to require a push to make them turn, so well was the carving executed.

I had felt ill all day, and at last, in the middle of my drawing, such violent fever and ague came on as obliged me to give it up very unwillingly; and as the attack lasted some hours, my sketching came to an untimely end, and I was unable to see the remainder of the temple or the east side of the city.

However, before the fever began, I had managed to ascend the "Matun Purwut," a stupendous pile of rocks, by the stone steps which had been cut in them; my bearers easily carried my chair—and from the top—an elevation probably of five hundred feet—I had enjoyed a magnificent view. The whole area of the old city lay spread out before me—the noble temples, and their lines of building—the ranges of fantastic rocks piled on all sides—the course of the river, for miles above and below the "Gate"—and the blue Raman Mul-lay Mountains, and their varied spurs, stretching away to the south.

I was very sorry to say farewell to the Rajah, whose genuine and most courteous hospitality and agreeable manners had made a great impression upon me. I had been told I should find him haughty and repellent: on the contrary, he was entirely free from presumption, full of information and intelligence, active and manly in his habits, and of very prepossessing appearance—in every respect a “gentleman,”—and I was glad I had gone out of my way to visit him.

I stayed a day longer to recruit after my fit of fever, and went again to the great temple, and to the avenue of pilgrim's cloisters, and so round to the palace of the kings and its surroundings, all of the highest interest. The palaces could never have equalled those of Beejapoor: there were no arches, and the roof had evidently been made of wood, covered with concrete, and supported on wooden pillars. These had either been destroyed on the spot or carried away, as no vestige of them remained. There was nothing to compare with the fort at Beejapoor. The defences of Beejanugger were mean and weak in comparison; and the ancient Rajahs, who had

One Cesar Federicke, a Venetian merchant, gives a very interesting description of the city in 1565, after the residence there of the victorious Mussulman kings for six months. He says :—

“The city was not altogether destroyed, but houses still stand empty, and there are dwelling in them nothing but tigers and other wild beasts. The enceinte of the city is about four-and-twenty miles, and within the walls are several mountains. The houses stand walled with earth, and no place, saving the palaces of the three tyrants and the pagodas, other than made with earth.”

Evidently, therefore, the city was exactly the same as the Hindoo habitations of the present day,—the walls of houses being of mud, or clay and stone, and the roofs of clay beaten down—very substantial as long as the roof is good, but which crumbles away on the percolation of water.

In the large volume which illustrates the ‘Temples of Western India,’ which I have before alluded to, many fine photographic illustrations of Beejanugger will be found, and the views of the temple of Withul or Wittoba are especially worthy of examination.

From Becjanugger I ascended the pass through the Raman Mullay Mountain by a beautiful road constructed by the Madras engineers, at an easy gradient the whole way up. I was well enough now to ride, and enjoyed the lovely scenery to the full. At the top I found a nearly level plain, and a total change of climate from India to Europe. Ramandroog is, I believe, about 4000 feet above the sea-level, and its climate is delicious throughout the year. Even during the hottest season the sea-breeze makes its way up, and there is no oppressive heat. Here there is a sanitarium, and I had sent word to the medical officer in charge that I was coming up for advice. I well remember we had to have a fire lighted that evening as it was so chilly, and that we sat over it till a late hour most thoroughly enjoying it. How I slept that night ! All the evil demons that had been tormenting me—neuralgia, rheumatism, and all their doleful train, vanished as if by magic with the change of air. The doctor said I had been too long without a thorough change and rest from work, and that there was nothing for it but to take furlough and go home to England as soon as I could. He would not answer for my life, he said, if I remained at Shorapoor through another hot season. I enjoyed some days at Ramandroog very much ; my strength and appetite returned ; I felt fresh vigour and renewed health, and could take a good long walk without fatigue. However, I might not stay ; time was precious, and I set off again to my work.

I went to Koorgah, where my tents were pitched, and where there was a fine ancient weir for irrigation, which required repair on my side, the authorities of Bellary having already restored their portion. The old Rajahs of Beejanugger had been great constructors of irrigation works from time to time, had thrown several dams across the Tungabhadra river, and had diverted the various streams so as to employ them extensively for the cultivation of rice, sugar-cane and cocoa-nut, ginger, turmeric, and other produce. At Koorgah the constructor had been Achoot Rao, and the inscription bore date 1537. This dam consisted for the most part of large loose blocks of granite, placed together on a broad base in a triangular form, and which had gradually become consolidated by silt. Many noble tanks, too, had been constructed by the Beejanugger dynasty, the largest being nearly three square miles in area.

My district work now fairly began, and was fearfully heavy, while the petitions against one grievance or another became almost too numerous to attend to or settle at all as I could wish. Here the fever returned, and I could only do my work lying on my bed, for I was too weak to sit up much, and I began to fear I should soon fail utterly.

For change I went further north to Kopal-droog, a marvellous fort indeed, being entirely impregnable. It consists of two fortifications, one, encircling the town, which had been remodelled by the French engineers in Tippoo's service, and all the bastions and cavaliers fitted with embrasures, and ramparts for heavy guns; the other fortification being of the great granite rock within the enceinte, the batteries of which command every portion of the land below on all sides to a great distance.

This hill-fort must be upwards of 500 feet high, and is inaccessible except by a flight of very rude rough steps which wind in and out among the rocks, and are in some places extremely narrow and unsafe. How many guns were ever carried up, it is impossible to say, but there were several old ones in the upper batteries. I went up this rock once, my bearers having contrived a light conveyance out of an arm-chair, and I travelled along easily. Had the insurgent Bheem Rao confined himself to operations against villages, he would have done much mischief, and roused the people, who seemed ripe for insurrection ; but he got possession of Kopaldroog by a stratagem, and found himself there in a trap. He could not hold so large a place, and his party betook themselves to the steps of the fort, where many, including the Rajah himself, were slain, and the rest were forced to surrender at discretion, for they had no food. I found the summit of this rock was composed of a large circular battery, and below it some deep cisterns in the naked rock contained beautiful clear water. About three miles south of Kopaldroog lay another rock-fort, if possible even stronger and more difficult of access, but not so high, and equally well provided with water in the same manner.

At Kookanoor, near the border of the Dharwar Collectorate, I found a very beautiful Hindoo temple dedicated to Siva. The pillars of the porch and hall were of polished greenstone, and seemed almost as if they had been turned in a lathe, the different circles of ornamentation were so exact ; and the designs were cut out as sharply in this tough, hard stone, as if they had been chased in metal. Near the town was a curious monolith of sandstone thirty-five feet in height, richly decorated, and having a figure of a cock on the top. There was a long inscription on the pillar, apparently in ancient Canarese, and I regretted very much that no one was able to decipher it. A little further on I found another superb temple; the ornamentation of its pillars was truly exquisite, and the designs so delicate that the various patterns were copied by the goldsmiths of the country for gold and silver ornaments.

This was the limit of my district, which contained, in addition to the foregoing, many illustrations of the Jain and Hindoo architecture, dating from A.D. 76 to the 13th century. Many of their works are represented in the volumes before alluded to, but very many more certainly remain comparatively unknown. Had I been originally appointed to the Raichore District, I should have delighted in making myself acquainted with all these wonderful and very curious and beautiful buildings; but as I have recorded, my lines fell in other places, and now I had not the time to devote to them as I wished. The archæological features of Raichore would have supplied a noble field for research. It had been the battle-ground of the ancient western Hindoo and Jain dynasties, as well as the Mussulman and Hindoo, and each in succession had left their distinctive marks of occupation.

I pushed on to Gulburgah and Humam Ságor, once a great city, as was apparent from its ruins, which spread over a large area. There was nothing, however, remarkable in them. Here my friend, the Rev. Mr Keis, of whom I have before made mention, paid me a visit, as he happened to be in the neighbourhood on one of his tours, and we had a pleasant talk over old times. He had succeeded well in his work since our last meeting, and one whole village community had become Christians; they were weavers by trade. He was travelling about in his old fashion, a true missionary, going from village to village ministering to and teaching the people as he found occasion—everywhere welcome, and everywhere respected; for the people saw his earnestness, and his pure, humble, godly life, and loved him for his simplicity and his benevolence.

I visited the fort of Gujundergurh, which belonged with its dependencies to a Southern Mahratta chief, and also a remarkable place of pilgrimage near it on the side of the mountain, which proved exceedingly picturesque. Almost half-way up the hill, and at the foot of its precipitous sandstone top, is a cavern in which an image of Siva is placed. This is approached by steps, wide at foot and narrowing to the last gallery. The cavern is a natural aperture between two enormous blocks of granite; and on further examination of the hill, I found that the whole of the flat upper portion, which was upwards of 300 feet in height, with precipitous sides, rested upon granite, which had been raised from the plain around by some subterranean upheaval. The fort was built on a portion of this elevation, and as its chief had been implicated in the late insurrectionary movements, and his loyalty was still very doubtful, part of the walls and gates had recently been blown up, and the fort thereby rendered untenable.

I had now done what I could in the Raichore Doab, and I have not described my work minutely, as it was of the same character as that I had previously been employed upon, and there would be no use in multiplying details. The fever had again returned, with neuralgia and other trying accompaniments, and I felt that something must soon be done. I could not hold on much longer. It was no use attempting anything more in Raichore, because it now transpired that the province was to be restored to the Nizam, and Nuldroog also; and that, as the revenues had largely increased, and were more than sufficient for the purpose for which the original cession had been made, the assignment would now be restricted to Berar, the whole of which, without any reservation, was to be retained, along with some portions to the south and east, which had not been included in the previous agreement.

Evidently the time had come when the Commission would be remodelled, but how it might affect me, it was impossible to tell. Had my health continued good, I should never have dreamed of leaving India, for I loved the country, and I loved the people; but I felt I could no longer stay now. I had no wish to retire from active work, and hoped to return to live and die, if God willed it, among the people. And I thought in any case I could take leave and go as far as Malta, where my father would meet me, and I could bring back my children with me, and by that time the new arrangements would be completed, and I should know what position I would occupy when the new treaty with H.H. the Nizam was concluded.

I was obliged to admit now, that work was growing very difficult to me. Medicine seemed powerless to check the perpetual ague and fever, and a debility and want of energy came over me which I could not struggle against. The doctor at Linsoogoor told me very plainly that I had no chance of recovery in India, and that if I stayed, my illness must go on from bad to worse. I sent up his report upon my case to the Resident, at the earnest entreaty of my friends, who thought me very ill, and made an application for two years' leave of absence, which was all I could hope to get under the rules.

I gave over charge of the Raichore Doab to Mr Ricketts, my only Assistant, and, taking a sad farewell of my friends, whom I never then thought I should see again, I went to Shorapoor to try and close my work there.

The Treasury was in a prosperous condition, and I was allowed to take from it the price of my house, for which I fortunately held the late Rajah's note of hand. I was very thankful for this piece of good fortune, although I had of course to put up with the loss of interest on my money.

At Shorapoor the utmost anxiety prevailed as to the ultimate destiny of the State, but I could give no opinion whatever; and its fate remained yet uncertain. There was much dread that it would be made over to the Mussulmans, their old hereditary enemies; and I found this fear was disturbing the people very much.

“We shall no longer be true Hindoos,” was the general cry. “Cows will be killed in our precincts, and the flesh will be sold in our streets. Hundreds of years have passed since this indignity has been offered us, and now we dare not resist it.”

What could I say? or what assurance could I give them that such would not be the case?

I grew better at Shorapoor. I went out to Bohnal, and had a last sail on the beautiful lake. I left instructions for the completion of Kuchaknoor, in case it should ever be found practicable to go on with it. I looked round all the roads and plantations, and saw them in a satisfactory condition. I settled all estates belonging to individuals on a more permanent basis, and recommended that the Rances should have theirs restored to them.

My last farewells to all the people were very trying. They saw I could not stay, and had little hope they should ever see me again. On the 25th February they asked me to preside at a last darbar, and presented me with the following address, which is literally translated:—

“ We, the undersigned Pundits, Alims, Rajah’s relatives, Government servants, merchants, Wutundars or hereditary State servants, Jagheerdars, soldiers, ryots, and others, residents in and belonging to Shorapoor principality, respectfully beg to subscribe the following Address to you, in the sanguine hope that you will accept it as a token of our respect and esteem towards you :—

“ 1. We unanimously beg to state that, on account of your being in readiness to return to England, we are plunged into much grief ; but your health having declined, from your residence in this country for the long period of thirty-six years, engaged in the arduous service of Government, protecting and benefiting thousands of people with much care and benevolence, you are disabled by over-exertion from continuing any longer to perform your very laborious duties for the benefit of the country and its people, without some relaxation ; therefore, you have necessarily determined to go home, and remain there, among your relatives and friends, and thus return with renewed vigour to support thousands of people in this country. But this, we hope, temporary, separation has overpowered our minds with sincere anxiety, and we have only one alternative to allay it—in the hope of expecting your happy and safe return amongst us soon, and humbly to pray to the ever-blessing Almighty to restore happiness upon you, your beloved father, and daughters, kindred and friends.

“ 2. Since your arrival in this country, you have done great things to secure happiness to the people; and though they are too numerous to be enumerated here, yet, by recapitulating some of them, as far as our abilities will allow us, we trust they will enable us to pass our time in joy, by frequently refreshing our hearts with their recitation until you return to this country. With this desire, we have ventured to intrude upon your precious time, in the hope that you will kindly pardon us, and permit us to say what we feel on this occasion.

“ 3. The cause of your first coming to this district was this: certain unsatisfactory circumstances having occurred, which threatened the welfare of the State and its Prince, in reference to their relations with the State of Hyderabad, the considerate British Government became a mediator between the two States, and appointed you Political Agent in this principality, in the year 1842. From that period until 1852, you administered the country very judiciously, and according to its requirements; and brought it into a very prosperous condition, both as regards the public revenue and the improvement of the morals of the people. All this is not only known to us who have this day assembled here, but it is patent to the world.

“4. In this district certain crime-thirsty wretches used, before your arrival, to commit atrocities to the injury and suffering of the people. But you, with the weapons of your judgment and discretion, extirpated their vices, and led them to pursue virtuous paths of life, thereby affording true security to life, honour, and property; and the country prospered day by day. In any country where courts of justice are established, and justice is properly administered, that country does not acquire a bad reputation. So the misrule which prevailed in this district before 1842 was speedily annihilated by the awe of your prompt and impartial justice, just as darkness vanishes on the appearance of the sun.

“5. By introducing wise measures into the revenue affairs of the State from 1842 to 1852 the people fearlessly cultivated waste lands, and thereby the revenue doubled in ten years. This advantage was not only secured to Government, but to the people; because during their former administration the people did not know the value of continuously holding any lands from which they could derive profit for their labour, whereas they now cultivated considerable quantities of land in excess of their former means, thus contributing to the public revenue, as well as adding to their profits. Hence in 1852 about one and a half lakhs of beegahs [150,000 acres] of lease expired, and cleared fields were ready to yield full assessment in the following year, in addition to the ordinary cultivation of the State.

“6. From the increase thus obtained, works of public utility and remuneration—viz., roads, State buildings, tanks, wells, &c., were constructed, and avenues, gardens, groves, &c., were planted. This is one of the reasons by which your name and fame have become popular, and everlasting in this district.

“7. At this healthy state of affairs, the late Rajah of Shorapoor having attained majority, you considered it advisable that the management of the country should be intrusted to him, and Government having, on your recommendation, sanctioned the measure, you made over the principalty to him, giving him your friendly and full advice in regard to his future conduct in his responsible and dignified position, and as to governing his people; and then you proceeded to join your new appointment of Deputy-Commissioner at Nuldroog. There, too, by your amiable disposition, generosity, benevolence, ingenuity, and zeal, you created abundant security and happiness to the people of that country, and profit to Government. You built there new tanks, constructed roads, and other works of public utility, and thus became entitled to the respect and gratitude of the people. Convinced of your abilities, the Government sent you as Deputy-Commissioner to the district of Berar.

“ 8. Here, in this principality, for two or three years after the Rajah's assumption of independent management of his country, he conducted his affairs tolerably well; but, at this period, he was unfortunately surrounded by a band of designing and capricious men, who took advantage of his youth, imbued him with bad notions, and, misusing his name, committed atrocities with impunity. This becoming known to the Resident at Hyderabad, he deputed his second Assistant to Shorapoor for the purpose of ascertaining the true state of affairs, and dispersion of all ill-advisers.

“ But while things were in this state, the Rajah’s intriguing band unauthorisedly fired at the Government troops who were encamped below the town ; then the young Rajah became alarmed for the consequences, and fled to Hyderabad, to seek refuge with the Government itself. The inhabitants of the town, beholding these things, fled for their lives, accompanied by their wives and children, abandoning their homes and property, lest worse things might happen to them. Immediately after the Rajah’s flight, the British troops took possession of the town, and plundered it for three days, thereby making it desolate and deserted. At this unhappy period we, of this place, were praying to God to send His messenger in your form for our relief ; but as you were in a higher appointment, and in a distant country, we had not much hope of your coming at all. But lo ! when God pleases and blesses, the very impossibilities become possibilities at once. So, according to the heartfelt desires of the people of this country, the Resident, by God’s will and influence, suddenly thought of sending you here, and took the necessary measures accordingly.

With what joy and thankfulness the population, old and young, great and small, received the intelligence of your nomination to this place (because we had our long-cherished hopes and confidence in your magnanimity and justice) is beyond all description. And our anticipations of good from you were greatly strengthened when we knew of your true feelings for the Rajah when you saw him at Hyderabad. Your feelings were so affected and plunged into grief at the sight of that unfortunate Rajah, that it was hardly possible, even for his own parents, to grieve at his misfortune more bitterly than you. Thus have you continuously manifested great interest and kindness towards this principality and its rulers; and this being universally known to the people, even before your arrival at Shorapoor, those who had abandoned their homes in despair and anxiety, speedily returned without apprehension. All this, of course, depended upon your kind and humane disposition and goodwill towards the people.

“ 9. On your arrival here you caused all the anarchy and misrule that had taken place to disappear. You introduced new regulations, and secured a proper and correct system of management. From this much good and advantage have accrued to the people. By your constructing good roads around the town, much comfort and convenience have been enjoyed by the traders and people in general; and the praises which are merrily sung to your name by the travellers, old and young, on these roads, are indeed gratifying and pleasing to the hearers.

“10. The thousands of mango-trees, planted by you in and about the town during your former administration of this country, are now bearing abundant fruit; and, as you are now again planting thousands of trees, with great pains, for our benefit, we humbly pray to God that He will likewise ordain you shall be present here when these infant trees shall similarly bear fruit.

“11. You have used your full powers in securing and continuing various rights, perquisites, meeras or hereditary lands, and allowances, &c., which were enjoyed by the people; and if, in spite of your generous endeavours, any unfortunate person's expectations were not realised, it is no fault of yours, but his own misfortune. Consequently, we are all content with what you have done for us, and are under great obligations to you.

“12. When sedition and rebellion occurred here in 1858, certain senseless persons were concerned in them, and they were liable to heavy penalties ; and if you had punished them, notwithstanding the proclamation of amnesty, you would not have exceeded the requirements of the law, nor their deserts ; but, not considering their past violent and intriguing acts, you have saved their lives and honour from destruction. For this singular kindness, these people should be grateful and thankful to you for ever ; and this assembly ardently believes they will be so.

“ 13. Another, the principal request and prayer of this assembly, is, that this principality should be restored to the family of the late Rajah, in compassion for their misfortune, and the maintenance of charitable and other ancient institutions which have existed and have been enjoyed for centuries. To attain this end, we trust you will accord your support ; but we are aware it depends mainly upon the future good conduct and loyalty, as also destiny, of the expectants of this dignity. It is the duty, nevertheless, of this assembly to pray constantly to the Almighty that Government will, in their exalted generosity, pardon all past misdemeanours, and indulgently protect the remnants of the late chief's family.

“ 14. That your projects for constructing a series of new roads and a market-place, and for lighting the town, as well as for erecting travellers' and strangers' homes, sinking wells, building tanks, &c., for the use and benefit of the people, as well as for improving the public revenue, should be carried out after your return, in renewed health, is the heartfelt prayer of this assembly.

"15. All your acts being of benevolence and for the good of the people, there is very little time to recount them all here; and it is likewise hardly possible to give preference to any one of them. We, therefore, most respectfully beg to entreat that you will kindly accept what we have briefly stated above, as a sincere expression of our feelings towards you, and we crave that you will pardon us for our rather long intrusion upon your time.

"16. It may only be known to the light of the world, the Sun, if there were any persons like you on the face of the earth; but, as far as our experience goes, we know not a more kind-hearted, equitable, painstaking, skilful, and benevolent gentleman than you; and we are constrained to think that your qualities have no parallel save in you.

"17 We are afraid that you may have tired of our loquacity; but, our hearts being full with heavy anxiety at the thought of our approaching temporary separation, and being unable to bear it without giving utterance to our feelings, we have ventured to occupy a good deal of your time, for doing which we have already craved your pardon.

“18. In conclusion, we most ardently hope that, by the blessing of the Almighty Protector, you will happily and safely reach your country, and meet your most beloved and endeared father, daughters, brothers, and all who for a series of years have been intensely longing for your return, and cause them to rejoice. And we further heartily and sincerely pray to the Lord of the Universe to bestow upon you abundant longevity, renewed health, greater grandeur, and higher powers, and safely and happily bring you again to this country, in order that thousands of people may find a ready asylum in you for their protection, and so your fame and glory may be greatly aggrandised; and, by the grace of God, we confidently hope to realise these our desires and expectations.

“Again tendering our warmest, sincere, and affectionate but respectful thanks to you for the cordial support and courtesy you have usually evinced towards us, according to our respective positions in society, during your former and present career in this principality, we are proud that you carry with you our heartfelt gratitude and good wishes. May God bless you and yours for ever'

"We beg to remain, with the utmost respect, dear sir, your most obedient, faithful, obliged, and humble servants and well-wishers, सत्यमेव जयते Extra Assist. Commisr."

"J. SEETA RAM RAO,

I cannot describe the scene; but its passionate character can be imagined from the purport of what is recorded above in the quaint, simple words of the people. None of them had been strangers to me; many had grown up from children under my sight, and had now children of their own about their knees; others were old and greyheaded; and many whom I had known had gone to their rest. It was not an easy task to leave them all; but I had to go, and I do not think I am forgotten there even now. I intended to depart quietly in the night; but I found the chiefs of the Beydur clans assembled in the streets, and it was as difficult now to reach the north gate of the city as it had been to enter it two years before—only, instead of a clamour of joyous welcome, there was now sad wailing of women, while the men walked by me in utter silence. Now and then some one would exclaim, “We have no one now to care for us; but our women will sing of you as they grind corn in the morning, and will light their lamps in your name at night. Come back to us; oh, come back!”

It was very sad and very solemn, and can never be forgotten. At every village the people came about me, the mothers holding up their children for me to put my hands upon their heads and bless them; and it was all so simple, so earnest, and so heartfelt, one could not but feel its sincerity. People ask me what I found in the natives to like so much. Could I help loving them when they loved me so? Why should I not love them? I had never courted popularity. I had but tried to be just to all, and to secure to the meanest applicant consideration of his complaint, by allowing unrestricted communication with myself.

Thousands wished to have signed the address had time permitted it ; but there are quite enough signatures to show the attachment of the people to the only Englishman whom most of them had ever seen, and certainly the first who had exercised any authority over them. At Nuldroog the sincere love of the people was shown in the address before given ; in Berar I accepted the loyal and peaceful demeanour of the population as a marked proof of their attachment to me in the most trying crisis of the great rebellion.

In all I had ruled over 36,000 square miles of area, and a population of upwards of five millions of a most industrious and intelligent people, not only without a single complaint against my rule, but, as I think and hope, with a place in their affections and respect, gained by no other means than by exercising simple courtesy and justice to all. I was often told by various friends, "You do too much for people who will never thank you." I do not think so : I did not do half enough, and I could have done more had I had more help. God is my witness, I tried to do as much as I could, and heartily regretted being obliged, through physical inability, to leave undone many a measure of progress and advancement which I hoped to accomplish.

I travelled slowly to Hyderabad, for I could not bear long marches now, and stayed at the Residency, where there was still much to do before I could leave. Even now furlough to England was very difficult to obtain, and, but for the Resident's private intercession with the Governor-General, I should not have got it at all.

I was very glad to be able at this time to render my friend, Colonel Davidson, the Resident, an essential service in writing a series of letters to the 'Friend of India' in justification of his conduct in remaining at the Residency after the officers commanding at Secunderabad had thought it desirable to leave it, and also in sending away the Contingent troops to act under Sir Hugh Rose. Both these acts of the Resident were severely censured, and deemed "worse than rash;" but I considered that the complaints made were totally unfounded. Had the Resident gone into Secunderabad, the desertion of the Residency would have been looked upon as a sign of fear, and the loyal minister, Salar Jung, would have been left to his fate. What might have happened had he not been able to control the fanatical element of Hyderabad, or had the British all entrenched themselves at Secunderabad, who can say? By remaining firm, the Resident showed the minister that he had every confidence in him—a confidence which has been fully merited, and never abused by Sir Salar Jung.

I regarded the march of the Contingent, too, as a triumph of will over disaffection. No one denied that many of its members had trembled on the verge of mutiny, and no doubt, in their cantonment, they were sorely tempted and chafed by inaction. The effect, however, of the Nizam's troops having joined the English cause, while Scindia's soldiers coalesced with the rebels, soon became known and apparent to all, as the Hyderabad Contingent fought, as Lord Strathnairn himself has told me, more like Englishmen than natives. The honours they gained in the field kept them quiet, and as their loyalty was now beyond question, the whole of the Nizam's territory kept quiet also; nor, with the one exception of the insurrection at Hyderabad, was there a single instance of treason to the English during the whole of that most trying period.

My letters were upheld and supported by the 'Friend of India,' and I believe produced a good effect in England, although the opposition party was a very strong one. I pressed Colonel Davidson very earnestly to come home with me, for he was very ill; but he would not leave his post, and died there the year following.

I left Hyderabad at length, and as the road viâ Hominabad and Nuldroog was now finished, I went by it as far as Sholapoor; then there was the railway. At Nuldroog I had left my plate and various articles in the treasury; but, alas! some one had, during those troublous times, broken open the plate-chest, and several articles had been abstracted, most of which, however, I afterwards recovered; but I was much grieved at the loss of a small bag containing all the autograph letters I valued most, and a few little ornaments which my wife had always worn. They were of no value to any one intrinsically, and must have been taken for the sake of the bag, which was prettily embroidered in gold thread.

On the road I reached one of the stage bungalows for travellers, and, being very weak, was being lifted from my palankeen by one of my servants, when two gentlemen came forward to help me. "Was I Captain Meadows Taylor?" they asked, "who was anxiously expected at Malta?" "Yes, I was;" and they told me they had been fellow passengers with my dear ones, who were awaiting me there, and gave me many particulars of them. Going home seemed at last to be growing a reality!

I passed a day and a night at Sholapoor with my dear friend Abingdon Compton, and he urged me, if I missed the steamer, which seemed very probable, as I was too weak to travel very quickly, to go up to stay with his wife at the Mahabuleswar; and indeed, he said, I had better not go to England till the next steamer, as he knew Lord Elphinstone was at the Hills, and wanted to see me, and, in any case, it was no use my waiting a fortnight in the heat at Bombay. I promised to go if I missed the steamer; but I was in time, having just two days to spare before it sailed. How strangely events happen! Had I missed that mail, I should have gone to Mahabuleswar, and should, as I afterwards found, have been offered by Lord Elphinstone the "Directorship of Jails," an appointment which I could have held, worth £2500 a-year! He had kept it for me; but finding I had gone home on sick leave, was obliged to bestow it elsewhere. I should have stayed in India, and have taken up my appointment, telling my father to come on at once. I could have remained at the Hills, would have entered a new department of the service where there was no press of work, and where I could travel as I pleased. But luck was against me! Yet, why should I say this? I might not have been able to stand the Indian climate longer, even at the Hills, and with lighter work. At all events, God willed it otherwise. I heard before I left, that Nuldroog and Raichore were to be restored to the Nizam, and that Shorapoor was to be given to him as a token of the appreciation of the British Government of his faithfulness and loyalty in the mutiny. So, what would have become of me without Lord Elphinstone's kind offer was not apparent, and I should have at once accepted it had I remained in India.

I had a pleasant party of fellow-passengers; one poor fellow, who had been badly wounded by a bullet in the lungs, was specially consigned to my care, although, as his father said at parting, "You do indeed look fearfully ill yourself." And so I was; the relaxing heat of Bombay, and all my final journey and preparations, had exhausted me terribly, and I had grown so fat and unwieldy that to move about was a trouble to me. I asked one lady on board, whose husband had been Political Agent in Miniawar, why they had not come to me when obliged to fly? "We dared not," she said, "go to Berar. We were told you were a marked man, and dangerously popular. There would be no hope for us—nay, we heard you were already murdered!"

Yes, we had almost all in that ship been through trying scenes and many dangers, and a merciful God had brought us out safely from the land.

We arrived at Malta in due course, very late, after midnight, and no passengers could land till morning. I was sitting with the poor fellow who had been my constant care, and who was so ill that night we thought him dying, when a gentleman came up to me. "The P. and O. agent has come on board," he said, "and tells me he will take you and me ashore if we like, to-night. I know how anxious you are to go." I put my night things in a small bag, and went. I could not stay behind. It was as much as I could do to get up the long flight of steps into Valetta, and I had to sit down often; but at length the hotel was reached. All was quiet, every one in bed; but this was no time for ceremony, and in a few minutes I held my darlings to my heart.

CHAPTER XVIII.

I NEED not dwell upon that time. Any one who has followed me through the latter years of my life in India, so lonely and so utterly cut off from all society of any kind, will appreciate what it was to me to find myself again with those dearest to me on earth, to learn to know them and be known by them. And the days flew by, I feeling stronger, and my face losing the deep-drawn lines of pain about my forehead and mouth, which my children said they "ironed" out; and so they did, no doubt. I was, however, very far from well, although the excitement and delight of my first arrival had kept me up wonderfully. But Malta was growing hot, and we started for Naples, where we spent some delightful days, taking a fresh excursion every day—one to Pompeii and Herculaneum, the former presenting exactly the appearance of a Deccan town unroofed; one to Baia, and another to Vesuvius, which we partly ascended, but my strength was not equal to much yet. My old Indian helmet, with a scarlet pugeree tied round it, with gold ends, attracted much attention, and hats were raised as we drove along; and on passing the main guard, there rose a cry, "Il Generale!" and the guard fell in and saluted, to our very great amusement. There was a sudden exodus from Naples, owing to a rumour of cholera, and an apprehended attack by Garibaldi, and we decamped with the rest. We landed at Civita Vecchia, a very motley crowd, and a general scramble began for luggage and places in the train. My red pugeree stood me in good stead, however, and the officials came forward at once. Everything was at the service of "Il Generale" or "Eccellenza."

"Air you a Ingine general, sir?" asked an American, as I was entering the carriage.

"No, sir, an Indian officer, but not a general," I replied.

"Wal, sir, you air very fair for Ingy, you air. If you was to come to our country, they wouldn't know you for a Ingine; no, sir, they would not, I tell you, sir."

We stayed a fortnight in Rome. We saw all the pictures and the statues and the palaces. We made excursions to Tivoli and to Hadrian's villa. We saw St Peter's, too, under decoration for a great ceremony, and above all, I was introduced in the strangest manner to his Holiness the Pope. We had no tickets for the reserved seats for the occasion, not having secured them in time, and our old guide Stefano was sorely distressed at this. He, however, told us not to despair, "he had a great friend, a priest, who was to take part in the ceremony," and motioning me to follow, he marched straight to the door of the sacristy, and beckoned to his friend, explaining to him who I was, and how I had arrived too late to get tickets. I was bidden to enter, and was presented to a very benevolent-looking old gentleman as "Il Generale Inglese." I had hardly time to realise that it was the Pope himself, when he put out his hand to me, while I bent low and kissed it. He told me I was welcome, and desired the priest to see that we had good seats. We were conducted to a little door in one of the great pillars, where, ascending a spiral staircase, we found ourselves in a cosy little box, just large enough for four people, from which we saw and heard everything most perfectly.

What a world of new thought and beauty was opened to me! I revelled in the pictures and in the galleries at Rome; but even more, I believe, in those of Florence, where we literally lived in the Pitti Palace and the Uffizi. I think, however, I was most interested in the ancient remains—the statues and the busts—not only those of emperors, kings, and statesmen, but of the citizens and their wives, recalling the features of the age to which they belonged, the head-dresses and graceful draperies as worn at the period. Many of the women’s faces struck me as being truly noble, and their figures too, and as more intellectual and handsomer in type than those of the men. We could have lingered in Florence, in Bologna, in Milan, in Venice so dreamy and so exquisite, for weeks, nay, months; but time was passing, and we left beautiful Italy—its pictures, statues, noble ancient remains, its churches, and its lakes behind us—and crossed over the Splügen Pass into Bavaria. Surely the world can contain no fairer spot than those lakes of Italy, and it is quite impossible to decide whether Maggiore, or Lugano, with its wild grand beauty, or fair Como, lying sparkling in the sun, carries off the palm, all are so lovely and all so different. I do not know, and have not seen, the other Passes over the Alps, but I should think none can exceed the Splügen and the Via Mala in grandeur and in beauty ; nor could I, an old road-maker, cease to marvel at the great science and daring displayed in the engineering work. From Chur—after a détour made to visit dear relations in Bavaria, and stay some days with them in their beautiful old schloss—to Paris, by way of Basle and Strasbourg, a weary railway journey in very hot weather. Paris was almost unbearable from the heat, and we only waited long enough to get a few clothes, and then on to London, and back to home-life once more. My health, which at first had seemed almost re-established, now again broke down, showing that the evil still existed ; the fever returned perpetually ; and the best physicians, both in London and Dublin, shook their heads. The news from India was not reassuring. The treaty of 1860 was now accomplished ; the Raichore Doab and Nurdroog were transferred to the Nizam, and the principality of Shorapoor conferred upon him as a free gift in return for his loyal conduct during the mutiny. It was clear to me that except my Deputy-Com-missionership, I had no hope of promotion, unless I should be made Settlement Officer.

My eighteen months' leave expired in November 1861, and I obtained an extension for six months more; and as I was in London on this business, I had the honour of being summoned by the then Secretary of State for India, who was anxious for information in regard to Berar and its revenue settlement. He seemed to approve of the system I had introduced in Nuldroog during 1856-57, and listened earnestly while I described its details; he requested me to write him an official letter on the subject, and hinted that, although the Head Commissionership might not be given to an "uncovenanted servant," the appointment of Settlement Officer was one which I could hold.

Time passed. I confess I have no distinct memory of events. Constant illness, and, worse than all, a sort of debility of the brain, seemed to possess me, and were most distressing. I had not only lost my energy, but my memory also in great measure, and I was obliged to have every note looked over before it was posted, lest the sense should not be clear, or a strange jumble and repetition of words should be found. Indeed

I grew worse and worse, and the thought that I should, if this continued, be obliged to give up India altogether, made me miserable. My doctors apprehended, I have since heard, paralysis of the brain, and entreated my family to oppose my return to active work. As the expiration of my leave drew near, I made desperate efforts to have it renewed still further, offering to do without pay altogether if my place might be kept open for me. Sir Ranald Martin told me six months more would, perhaps, recruit my health, and promised to back my petition: I had friends too at the India House to help me. But it was of no avail; the rules of the "uncovenanted service" could not be broken, and my request was refused; so no alternative remained for me except to go out as I was, ill and weak, or to resign the service altogether. It was a hard battle. My heart was in my work, and I ardently longed to go back and try to carry on what I had been planning for the benefit of the people among whom I had lived my life, and whom I loved; but it seemed as if God, in His wisdom, had taken from me the power and strength I needed. "If you go back," said Sir Ranald Martin, "to the climate of Berar, you must die: you are totally unfit for duty, and the fever and ague are as bad as ever. Think of your life, and think of your children, and may God help you to a right decision. I never had a more painful case to deal with."

I thought over all this earnestly, and asked for help and guidance, and I saw clearly that it would not be right to run into the jaws of death as it were; so I gave up the struggle, and sent in my resignation with a very heavy heart. No one knows, even now, what a bitter grief it was to me to do this; but I trust I did what was right. I returned to Dublin very much cast down. I was not able to do anything except paint, and I took refuge in this, and in music: any attempt at writing set my head throbbing; and neither words nor thoughts would come. I looked sadly at the commencement of a story I had begun years before in India, and wondered whether I should ever be able to complete it.

A friend, finding me one day sitting on a doorstep in Dublin, faint and sick, and shivering with ague, took me home and told me how his brother, who had suffered terribly from Australian bush-fever, had derived much benefit from homœopathy. I had tried everything else, and every physician of note without avail, and I promised my friend to consult the doctor he told me of, and to give the system a fair trial.

I told my story to the kind physician he recommended, and also honestly confessed my want of faith in the system.

"I don't mind that," said the good man; "but it is rather hard to ask me to cure a malady of thirty years' standing, when so many great men have failed. However, I will try to alleviate—I cannot cure it; and I trust, under God's blessing, to give you some help. But you were right not to return to India."

I followed the prescriptions he gave me faithfully, and I amused myself by fishing, painting, and reading very light literature, and tried not to think about anything. The effect was really marvellous. I grew stronger and more energetic, and I felt some of my old power returning to me; and after a few months I went to my friend and asked his leave to begin to write.

"Do you feel able now?" he asked. "If you do, begin; but you must be very cautious, and do not fatigue your brain. If you feel the least tired or confused, stop."

I took his advice, and I began my novel of 'Tara.' The incidents and actions of the story had been planned for nearly twenty years; and I knew all the scenes and localities described, as I had the story in my mind during my visit to Beejapoor, and had noted the details accurately ; while my long residence in an entirely native State, and my intimate acquaintance with the people their manners, habits, and social organisation, gave me opportunities, which I think few Englishmen have ever enjoyed, of thoroughly understanding native life. One day, when talking of my projected book with my dear friend Mrs Cashel Hoey, whom I have known since she was a child, and whose career I have always watched with ever-increasing interest and affection, she said suddenly, " Now you have the plot so clearly defined in your brain, come and write it out chapter by chapter ; I will set it down exactly as you dictate to me." We went together to my study, and locked the door, and there for six hours we worked at it, she writing in total silence, and a perfect sketch of the whole tale was made, the details of which were filled up afterwards. I never remember feeling so utterly exhausted in my life ; but the relief when it was finished was intense, and we both were glad that we had resisted the entreaties to us to stop our work, and rest, which my children, fearing for me in my state of health, made more than once in vain. After this, I felt sure of my subject, and wrote confidently, but very slowly, for my brain had not regained its full strength yet; but the occupation interested me, and was a source of infinite delight. When my book was partly finished, I wrote to Messrs Blackwood, offering it to them, and telling them how it had been promised twenty years before, for 'Blackwood's Magazine,' when I had written the 'Confessions of a Thug.'

My book was accepted, and, still writing very slowly, I finished and published it in 1863. It was most favourably received. All the leading papers — the 'Times,' 'Morning Post,' 'Athenæum,' 'Saturday Review,' and the Quarterlies — were loud in its praise; and I only mention this at length, because I had been very anxious as to my reception in the literary world, after a silence of so many years; and I was not a little gratified to find myself welcomed once more so warmly.

'Tara' was the first of the series of three historical romances which I had proposed to write on the three great modern periods of Indian history, which occurred at an interval of exactly a hundred years. 'Tara' illustrated the rise of the Mahrattas, and their first blow against the Mussulman power in 1657.

'Ralph Darnell,' my second work, was to illus-

‘Seeta,’ which was to be the third, was to illustrate the attempts of all classes alike to rid themselves of the English by the Mutiny of 1857.

‘Ralph Darnell,’ which appeared in 1865, was also well received, and I had every encouragement to persevere.

I read a paper upon my discoveries of cairns, cromlechs, &c., in Shorapoor, before the Royal Irish Academy, with illustrations and sketches of what I found, which, I believe, completely established the identity of those remains in India and in Europe, and, I have reason to think, was valuable archæologically. It was published in vol. xxiv. of the Society’s ‘Transactions,’ and illustrated with sixty-eight engravings. This had been a subject which, since I had made the first identification in relation to the cromlechs and cairns of Rajun Kooloor, I had followed up with the greatest interest, until I obtained ample confirmation of my views in the cairns on Twizell Moor, Northumberland, in the autumn of 1864.

I was placed in charge of the Indian Department of the Dublin Exhibition of 1865 by my friend Dr Forbes Watson; and on the occasion of the visit of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales to the Exhibition, was called on to attend and explain various matters to him. He was especially struck by the large raised map of the eastern coast of India, constructed to scale by the late Mr Montgomery Martin, which I had painted afresh, and of which the Prince showed a very intimate knowledge. He had evidently studied Indian subjects deeply, and appeared gratified by the information I was able to give in regard both to the natural productions and the articles of manufacture displayed.

My next task was to write the historical and descriptive portions of two superb volumes of Photographs of the City of Beejapoor and the Hindoo Temples of the Southern Mahratta country. These volumes were published by Mr John Murray, the architectural portions being contributed by my friend Mr James Fergusson.

This led to my undertaking the descriptive letterpress of a work entitled 'The People of India,' which consisted of a series of photographs of the different races, tribes, and orders of the people all over India, and involved much labour and research. The descriptions were necessarily very short, and as much information as possible had to be compressed into a few meagre lines. The work was brought out by the India Office, and no limit was affixed to it. Up to the present year (1874) six volumes have been completed.

I also began a series of Indian articles for Messrs Cassell, Petter, and Galpin's Biographical Dictionary, which, as far as I know, are the only contributions to Indian biography which exist. Of course the space here was also very circumscribed, and all I could do was to make the notices intelligible and useful for reference.

Thus I worked on, and employed myself as busily as I could, painting during my leisure hours. In 1868 we went abroad, and remained away for a year, wintering at that loveliest of places, Mentone—one of the sweetest spots, I think, the world contains. How we all enjoyed it, and what glorious walks, donkey rides, and excursions we made! And the flowers—but they are too beautiful for description. We used to bring home basket-loads of crimson and scarlet anemones, violets, tulips, and a thousand more, less gay, perhaps, but none the less beautiful. I worked on at the biographies and descriptions all the winter, steadily refusing to be tempted out until the afternoon. A project for a 'Child's History of India' was also growing in my brain, originated by a dear friend, a lady, coming to me one day with an armful of most stupendous-looking volumes, and saying, as she threw them down wearily, "Oh, Colonel Taylor, do tell me what I am to do. How can I teach the children the history of India out of those?" And indeed it seemed a truly formidable task. I was not able to set about a history of India just then, but later I confided the scheme to Messrs Longman, who begged I would make mine a 'Student's Manual of the History of India;' and this I eventually wrote some time later. The work was very laborious, and involved much minute study, occupying me in all about two years.

I had not long returned from Mentone when I was solicited by the Institute of Civil Engineers of Ireland to deliver a lecture upon the method of constructing large earthen embankments and sluices for irrigation tanks in India; and as I was much interested in the subject, I made the lecture as comprehensive as I could, and described the system adopted so as to retain the rainfall as much as possible. I had all my own plans, elevations, surveys, and sections, and some details of ancient native work. My lecture was printed in the 'Transactions' of the Society, and to my gratification, I was not only elected a member, but re-

My hard work over, my History was delightfully interrupted during 1869 by an announcement from the Secretary of State for India that Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen had been pleased, on the 2d of June, to appoint me a "Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India." The honour and gratification of the gift were enhanced by a communication from his Grace the Duke of Argyle, as he presented me with the order, that the selection of my name had been made by her Majesty herself.

I felt very grateful for this honour—which had been entirely unsolicited by me—not only as a recognition of any public service I had been able to perform during my Indian life, but as an assurance that I had not been forgotten though so long absent. Her Majesty had indeed recognised me at the first levee I attended after my return, and her words, "I am glad to see you back again," will always be treasured by me, as a very gratifying proof of her kind interest in so humble a servant as myself.

In 1871 my History appeared, as complete as I could make it in the limited space necessarily at my disposal, and I trusted that, having now a compendium, as it were, at their command, Principals of colleges and schools would bring the History of India more into their educational course. I inquired in many directions, but I could not discover that Indian history was taught anywhere. Why, I know not, for surely there can scarcely be any subject of greater importance to Englishmen than the history of the noble dependencies won by their ancestors, which, one would think, would be both more useful, and perhaps more interesting, than many subjects which seem to form part of the essential education of our boys.

I had to take a long rest now. The labour of the History had very much exhausted me, and I spent the interval in travelling and painting, and was elected honorary member of the Royal Hibernian Academy. In 1872 I began 'Seeta,' finishing it in June the same year; and up to the time I write, I have not begun any more works of fiction. After this 'Story of my Life' is finished, I hope, if I am spared, to revert to the romantic and medieval period of Deccan history, and write an illustration of it, the plot of which is growing in my brain.

From time to time I contributed articles to the 'Edinburgh Review,' on various subjects con-needed with India: every year one or more of these appeared. And I enjoyed this kind of literary labour very much, and am grateful it was given to me to do.

Also, from time to time, I gave public lectures on subjects connected with India, both in Dublin, Birmingham, Whitehaven, and other places. I wanted to bring India nearer to England—to bring its people nearer our people; and if, by my simple descriptions of life among the natives, any have felt more interest in their Indian brothers and sisters, or have been led to read and study more, my object has been attained. The following were the subjects of some of my lectures:—

“India Past and Present.”

And others, of which I have only notes.

I always found my audiences interested and amused; and I believe it only needs such illustrations to arouse an interest in, and bring India home to, the minds of English people.

I heard frequently from friends in India who did not forget to tell me about my old people and districts whenever they could hear of them. How Nuldroog and the Raichore Doab are now administered I know not, or whether the revenue remains as it was under English management. Of Berar there is at least no question. I have already stated that a portion of the Bombay survey was introduced in 1860, and its benefit and progress have been wonderful. Not only do the people possess their holdings, instead of being merely "tenants at will," liable to be dispossessed by any outbidder; but the cultivation has extended, as it was plain to see would be the case, with insured possession. All that is now wanting, to my perception, to complete the land settlement—which is exactly in principle what I proposed for Nuldroog in 1855—is the grant of title-deeds for estates and area of house occupation; and I hope these may be eventually issued. The increase of revenue has been enormous, and has accompanied the increase of cultivation. According to the Administrative Report of 1870-71, a final total of £5,467 was reached, which showed an increase of £14,985 in ten years; and as a large portion of the district is still unsurveyed, the revenue will in the end, there is little doubt, exceed a million sterling. I trust this magnificent practical result may induce Government to undertake a perpetual settlement on the sound basis of proprietary right, instead of the many shifty measures which have hitherto been in operation.

I have little more to add. I went to India with only one friend on whom I could rely, and upon him I had no claim except a slight relationship. I have had no education so to speak. What I know I have taught myself. I have gained my position, such as it is now, by steady hard work and perseverance; and that my humble services have been acknowledged by my Queen and my country in giving me the Star of India, is a recompense for which I am very grateful.

My literary work has been a great pleasure to me; but I can only write about the people among whom I lived, and whom I love and shall always love to the last. Had I known how to write about modern society, fast young ladies, roué young gentlemen, fair murderesses with golden hair, and all the "sensation" tribe, I doubt not I should have filled my pockets better; but it was no use,—I was too old and stiff to change my ways. The old Tooljapoor Brahmin spoke truly, "Much, very much money, passed through my hands," and yet I continue poor. But I am thankful,—thankful for having sufficient to live on, though not riches; for loving and beloved children; for many, many dear friends, who make me welcome always in the North, and in Yorkshire, and in Norfolk (is not the hot corner kept for me at Didlington when I am able to shoot?)—in London, where I sometimes go for a few weeks to have a glimpse of the great world and its doings—in Dublin, where, in my dear old home, I have a large circle of kind and loving friends. And is not this enough to make me happy and contented with my lot?

One word, one last reflection in regard to India, may not be out of place. It is to advise all who go there in whatever capacity, or whatever position they may hold,—use true courtesy to natives of all degrees. My experience has taught me that large masses of men are more easily led than driven, and that courtesy and kindness and firmness will gain many a point which, under a hard and haughty bearing, would prove unattainable. By courtesy I do not mean undue familiarity—far from it; self-respect must always be preserved. But there is a middle course which, if rightly pursued in a gentlemanly fashion, not only exacts respect from natives of all classes, but gratitude and affection likewise.

Grateful to God for all the mercies of my life, for His sustaining power, and the ability to do what I have been able to accomplish through all my life, all that I hope for, in my humble sphere, is that my efforts may be accepted by Him, and that, in Sir Henry Lawrence's words, "I may be thought of as one who strove to do his duty."

CHAPTER XIX.

CONCLUSION.

DURING the autumn and winter of 1874-75, my dear father suffered much from bronchitis and general debility; but in the quiet of his own study, to which his health almost entirely confined him, he wrote his last novel, 'A Noble Queen,' which appeared in chapters in 'The Overland Mail,' and also in 'The Week's News,' and was published by Messrs H. King & Co. His friends earnestly hope that the story may be published shortly in volume form, and thus become known more widely than at present in England. In India it has been much appreciated, and eagerly looked for on the arrival of each mail; and, to quote the 'Times of India,' "apart from its historic and literary interest, it abounds with attractive and excellent descriptions of Indian scenery." The story relates to the Mussulman kingdoms of Beejapoor and Ahmednugger; and its historic heroine is Chand Beebee, the dowager queen of Ali Adil Shah—its ideal heroine being Zora, the young granddaughter of an exiled dervish. My father also completed during these winter months the seventh and eighth volumes of the 'People of India.' Whether this great work will be continued by the order of the Secretary of State for India is not yet apparent; but the materials are almost inexhaustible, and it deserves to be made as complete as possible.

In May 1875 my father's eyesight suddenly failed him, and he wrote the concluding pages of 'A Noble Queen' with considerable difficulty. It was hoped earnestly that this dimness of vision was only temporary, and that, with renewed health, the precious sight might be regained. He visited London in order to obtain the best medical advice, and was told by the physicians that his best and only hope of recovery lay in passing the following winter in some warm, dry climate.

"I should like to go to India again, if you think the climate would suit me," he said. And after a long and deliberate consultation, leave was given; and he was told he might revisit the old scenes, now made yet more attractive by the residence at Hyderabad of his married daughter.

When the news of his determination to spend the winter in India reached Hyderabad, His Excellency, Sir Salar Jung, wrote in the kindest possible terms, expressing a hope that, if my father fulfilled his present intention, he would consider himself as his guest during his stay, and allow him to make all the arrangements he could for his comfort.

This invitation was gratefully accepted, and on the 12th of September 1875, he and I, with our faithful servant John, sailed from Liverpool in the s.s. Guy Mannering for Bombay. The change of air and the sea voyage seemed to benefit my father's general health, though there was scarcely any improvement in his sight. His memory was so wonderfully clear, and his recollection of places and scenes so accurate, that our captain was astonished, and declared he was led to look for and find out many points of interest that he had, in previous voyages, overlooked. We arrived at Bombay on the 15th of October, and, after a rest of two days, started for Hyderabad. The long railway journey, of twenty-seven hours, was borne without much fatigue, and my father seemed to rally wonderfully under the delight and excitement of meeting those so dear to him once more. His loss of sight was a sad drawback, but his patience under this terrible affliction was very touching. He could see a little, but not enough to read or write himself, or employ himself in any way ; and this to one of his indefatigably industrious habits was a trial which only those who knew him could appreciate. When not writing or reading he used to draw, or knit, or crotchet, and his delight was to surprise his friends with some specimen of his work. His interest in all that went on around him was as keen as ever ; and the numerous visits he received from his native friends afforded him great pleasure. Some came from long distances, only to see him, to touch his feet, or bring their simple offerings of fruit, sugarcandy, and garlands of sweet jessamine ; and it was very touching to see the love and reverence the people bore for him. One, a native of Shorapoor, told him how the people yet bewailed his loss, and how the women sang ballads to his honour as they ground their corn, and related stories of him to their children. He seemed to be so essentially the people's friend ; and that his memory and his deeds lived still in their hearts, was evident to all who saw the manner of their coming.

Owing to the prolonged absence of H.E. Sir Salar

Jung, both at Bombay and Calcutta, on the occasions of the visit of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, my father did not see so much of the Minister as he otherwise would have done; and this was a source of much mutual regret. But everything that princely hospitality could suggest, in the providing of house, servants, horses and carriages, and every comfort, was done by Sir Salar Jung to render my father's stay as pleasant and as comfortable as possible. He was able to partake of the hospitalities of the palace, too, on several occasions, especially that of the grand fête given on the arrival of Sir Richard Meade as Resident at Hyderabad; and he was able also to accept and enjoy invitations to the Residency, and among other friends. One great regret to him was that his health did not admit of his taking the long journey to Calcutta, in order to be present at the great gathering of the members of the "Order of the Star of India." He wrote his apologies to Sir Bartle Frere, begging him, if he would, to make known to H.R.H. the reason of his non-attendance, and received in reply a note which gratified him exceedingly. Not only was Sir Bartle Frere desired by the Prince of Wales to assure Colonel Taylor how much he regretted being deprived of the opportunity of making his personal acquaintance, but he added that he wished Colonel Taylor especially to know what pleasure he had derived from the perusal of his works on the voyage out to India. This gracious message and recognition of his literary labours were very pleasant to him, and afforded another instance, among so many at that time, of the graceful thoughtfulness and kindly feeling of his Royal Highness. In January 1876 my father was once more attacked by his old enemy, the jungle fever, and for many days and nights it seemed doubtful whether he would be spared to us yet a while. On the advice of his medical attendants, we took him back to Bombay, the climate there being considered better for his complaint, as it was more relaxing, and had not the excessive irritating dryness of Hyderabad. He remained at Bombay for a month. During this time he received many visits from persons acquainted with his Indian career and literary works, and enjoyed, on several occasions, long and earnest conversations with them, especially on subjects connected with native education and literature.

On this latter point he was exceedingly anxious, and it was his purpose, had his life been spared, to have contributed a series of letters to 'The Times of India' on the subject. In one letter, to a native gentleman friend, which has been largely quoted, after thanking him for his criticisms on 'Secta,' and admitting that it is impossible for a writer, not a Hindoo, to describe Brahminical observances and caste customs with absolute correctness, he thus proceeds :—

“Now why do not you, or some one of your friends, take up the subject of novels or tales, and instruct us on the subject of your people? If you wrote in Marathi, or Gujerati, you would have a vast audience. If in English, we—if the work were simply and truthfully written—would welcome the author warmly. Think of the still existing popularity of Goldsmith's 'Vicar of Wakefield,' which is undying; and how simple and pathetic the tale is. You have matter, too, for a hundred romances in Grant Duff's History, if you follow history; but that is not needed for general interest so much as writing that will move the hearts of the people, and become the foundation of a national literature of fiction, healthy, pure, and instructive to future generations. Why should we know only the dark side of Hindooism, and see none of the bright and light side, from the pens of its sons, now so rapidly advancing and advanced in modern science and thought? Any one of your people who might attempt this department of literature would, if he wrote simply, naturally, and without pedantry, secure for himself not only present reputation, but undying fame. I cannot believe the ability is wanting; all that is required is to be stimulated to healthy exertion on a pure model to achieve a decided success."

"I am glad to hear that my works have been read, if it be only to prove to those who read them that my interest in the people of India, of all classes, is as strong as ever, and increases with time. I would fain see the educated portion, striving to strike out new lines of occupation for themselves; and I do not despair of yet seeing illustrations of native life, native legends, and native history written by yourselves. Such as I am, though we strive never so much, cannot penetrate beyond the surface of that we see; and as for myself, in regard to 'Tara,' 'Seeta,' and my other books, where I have tried to work out phases of native character, male and female, I only hope I have produced pictures something like reality, and not caricatures. I think portions of 'Tara' and 'Seeta' would translate easily into Marathi; and I should like to hear that extracts of these books were done into Marathi to serve as reading-books for the new generation. Until Marathi and other native languages have a homely literature of their own, I confess there is the want of a principle which would encourage many to better things."

On the 15th March we embarked on board the s.s. Australia, belonging to the Rubattino Company, who had with great kindness reserved two cabins for my father's and my own use, without extra charge, in spite of an over-full complement of passengers. We were bound for Genoa, as we intended passing a little time in the south of France until the spring should be far enough advanced to permit of our return home. On the voyage my father became far more ill, and the loss of all power in his lower limbs was a great additional trial. He could no longer walk at all, and was carried up and down from his berth to his chair on deck. We reached Genoa, however, in safety on the 6th April, after a very calm voyage of twenty-one days, and travelled on next day to Mentone, where becoming gradually worse, and more and more helpless, he sank to rest peacefully and painlessly on the 13th of May 1876.

To the last my dear father retained all the brightness of his intellect, and his interest in all that passed. The night before his death he heard read with great pleasure the account of the arrival of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales in England, and spoke long and earnestly of the royal visit to India ; of the good it was likely to produce there ; of the courtesy which distinguished the Prince's behaviour to all natives of whatever degree, and his wish that such an example might be largely followed.

The papers both of England and India were filled with notices, all speaking of the varied and great talents my dear father possessed as soldier, administrator, man of science and of letters ; but we, whose privilege it was to be with him in his home, knew him best as the tenderest and most loving of parents, the wise friend, the true-hearted, humble Christian gentleman, ever casting his cares upon Him who cared for him in his strange neglected boyhood and early manhood, and who helped him to become what he was in private life and to attain the public distinctions which were awarded to him.

He rests at Mentone, in that spot so sacred to many English families and homes, amid the lovely scenes he delighted in, and among the sweet flowers he loved so well.
